PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 19, 1918.

Rev. Hugh T. Stevenson, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty and eternal God, in whom we live and move and have our being, as individuals and as a Nation we desire to thank Thee that Thou hast given us the privilege to serve and to glorify Thee. We ask Thee to direct our labor this day that it may bring glory and honor to Thee, advance the welfare of humanity, and develop the strength of our Nation as we may continue to serve Thee in the battles for freedom. We ask Thee to be with our men on land and on sea wherever they are. As Thou hast always crowned our efforts from the day of Concord Bridge and Lexington in battles for freedom with success so continue until the end shall come, and we shall give Thee the glory and thank Thee that Thou hast enabled us to serve Thee. Watch over and direct the affairs of the Senate and the House and the Nation this day, and throughout all the coming days, that we may ever have as a people that righteousness which exalts a Nation. We ask it in the name of our Lord. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore assumed the chair.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

IMPORTATION OF PRISON-MADE GOODS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting reports from consular officers at Chefoo, China; Odessa, Russia; Rome, Italy; Algiers, Algeria; and Kingston, Jamaica, relative to the extent to which prisoners, paupers, or detained persons are utilized in the production or manufacture of the commerce of various countries, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION (S. DOC. NO. 217).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Acting Secretary of War submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation in the sum of $11,075 required by the War Department to pay the salaries of the Second and Third Assistant Secretaries of War authorized under the act approved April 6, 1918, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF MAIL-TUBE SYSTEM.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Assembly of the State of New York, urging continuation and extension of the mail-tube system, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN SENATE, STATE OF NEW YORK,
Albany, April 12, 1918.

(By Mr. Cromwell.)

Whereas this legislature's action more than 25 years ago made possible the underground mail and parcel transportation which the metropolis enjoys and which all other cities of the State may also possess under the franchise granted by this body; and

Whereas the sentiment of New York, like that of the other large cities of the country where this modern mail-tube system has been tested, is emphatically in favor of it, as indicated by the press and by public expression, by the great business organizations, and by the public generally: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That this legislature associates itself with the public's progressive, enlightened demand for the retention and extension of such service as a necessity of the post office and a relief to the congestion of the already overcrowded thoroughfares of our larger cities; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Vice President and Speaker of the House for presentation to Congress.

By order of the Senate.

ERNEST A. FAY, Clerk.

IN ASSEMBLY, April 12, 1918.

Concurred in without amendment by order of the assembly.

FRED W. HAMMOND, Clerk.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NORRIS. I have here a copy of a resolution adopted unanimously at a very large meeting of citizens of Scottsbluff, Nebr. The resolution relates to the liberty loan. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution.

Whereas our country is engaged in war for world liberty; and

Whereas the Food Administration has said that food will win the war; and

Whereas millions of bushels of foodstuffs are being worse than wasted in the manufacture of malt liquors: Wherefore, be it

Resolved, That we hereby respectfully petition the President of the United States and Congress to give the country immediate war-time prohibition of the manufacture and sale of all forms of alcoholic liquors, including beer, for beverage purposes, in order that the resources of the country in men, money, and provisions may be conserved for the one great task of winning this war.

Respectfully submitted by a mass meeting of the citizens of Scottsbluff, Nebr., April 7, 1918.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted by the Massachusetts State Federation of Churches, favoring national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina presented petitions of sundry citizens of Bishopville, St. Charles, and Beaufort, all in the State of South Carolina, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide punishment for persons interfering with the Government in the prosecution of the war or who are responsible for pro-German activities, which were ordered to lie on the table.

PRICE OF COTTON.

Mr. OVERMAN. I send to the desk a telegram which I have received from the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], who is attending the funeral of the late Senator BROUSSARD. I ask that the Secretary may read the telegram.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., April 18, 1918.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Reported from Washington that EMERSON, of Ohio, introduced House bill to fix price of cotton 20 cents, causing demoralization in all branches in the cotton market. After conference with our cotton friends and bankers here, I urge you to make public statement immediately that no bill fixing price of cotton could pass unless it fixed prices on all articles made from cotton, including textiles, also on all products of the farm, also on manufactured articles of all kind, upon the same basis.

JOSEPH E. RANSDELL.

SPEEDING OF WAR PREPARATIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I received this morning a large number of cards, in printed form, showing that they had been sent out by some propaganda and were being circulated to be signed by individuals and sent to Members of Congress. I assume that every Member of Congress is receiving them. They demand attention, and they demand it now, because every one of them is an unjust and uncalled for assault upon Congress. They read:

"For God's sake, hurry up!"—Joseph H. Choate. This urgent appeal was the last public utterance of Joseph H. Choate, only three days before his death. The date—May 11, 1917—was almost a year ago.

Then there is the name of the address, the city and the State, and "address Hon. ———, United States Capitol, Washington, D. C." upon the back.

On the margin of this postal the sender has written these words: "Our boys are looking to you to speed up aeroplanes."

Mr. President, the man who signs this postal little understands what propaganda is responsible for sending it out. He does not understand that it comes either from some one who has no conception of what Congress has done in war appropriations and war measures and has, therefore, been misled by press headlines, or from some source which is attempting to hide the real responsibility for our failure to meet our war engagements by diverting the just censure from those who are responsible for the delay and directing it toward those who are not in the slightest degree responsible for that delay.

Believing that Mr. Chambard, who signs this card, is but one of very many honest and patriotic people who have been misled by these false charges of congressional delay, I think it time for some one to tell the truth and place the responsibility where it belongs, and therefore I propose to speak plainly to this gentleman.

Mr. Chambard, are you aware that Congress has voted with alacrity every dollar asked for by the President or the departments for war purposes?

Are you aware of the fact that unlimited power has been granted to these departments to expend this money for war purposes?

Are you aware of the fact that the delay is due to the failure, the shameful failure in many instances, of those appointed and empowered to speed up production—appointed by the administration and not by Congress, because Congress can not make the appointments—and that notwithstanding these persons have been spending this money in the wildest extravagance ever dreamed of, extravagance that would shock and horrify you were you present as we are to observe it, they still have been able to spend up to date only a small part of the enormous sums appropriated for the most pressing needs of the country, such as ships, guns, aeroplanes, and so forth?

You say, "Our boys are looking to you to speed up aeroplanes." Are you aware of the fact that in the early part of 1917 we appropriated $640,000,000 for aeroplanes alone and we have before us an estimate for $400,000,000 more, more than a billion dollars, more than one-fourth of the entire war debt of the Civil War, for just one little branch of the service?

You have seen aeros. You know their size and structure and can form some idea as to what they should cost and how rapidly they should be constructed. Our 1917 program called for 20,000 aeroplanes, 12,000 of which were to have been placed in France by this time. Now, you know that Congress can not build the aeroplanes. All Congress can do is to appropriate the money, put that money into the hands of the proper department, and instruct that department to go ahead and build them. That Congress has done, and yet up to date we have no planes in France and a mere bagatelle of the proposed number constructed.

Why is this? The answer is inefficiency in the departments, not in Congress. It is stated that no less than 1,500 changes in specifications for Liberty motors and planes have been made up to the present time and ordered to be made by the manufacturers. How on earth could you expect the manufacturers to produce these planes if every day in the year there came several new orders for variations? Had the department responsible for the production of these planes said to Mr. Ford, "We want 20,000 planes of the highest standard manufactured by either the French, the British, or the German powers; go ahead and get them out for us," we would have had them ready long ago.

Our shipping program, because of its greater importance in this war, has been more grossly neglected. We have appropriated for ships and ship construction $1,750,000,000. For the first six months of the war absolutely nothing was done while the board was quarreling over whether we should have wooden ships or steel ships. Since we have finally gotten started, we have allowed strikes and slacking to so hamper the production that we have not accomplished one-tenth of what we should have accomplished under good management had we proceeded immediately upon our entry into the war and continued efficiently thereafter.

But what more could Congress do? Congress is supposed simply to make the laws and the appropriations and leave to the executive branch of the Government the duty of making those laws effective. Congress has not only performed its duty but has performed it with alacrity, generosity, and unanimity almost unknown in legislative bodies. Then, observing that the work is not being done for which appropriations have been made, Congress has been compelled to criticize by resolution and through speeches and investigations, and individual Members have been compelled to press in every possible way the several executive departments to hurry up, speed up, to stop bickering, and to do something. So you have Congress as a whole passing every appropriation, with comparatively little debate, and then the Members doing everything in their power to get the departments charged with the duty of production to speed up the work.

And every time a criticism is made by a Member of Congress he has been subject to abuse by the press of the country because he complains that having voted the money either nothing is being accomplished or the work is not speeding as rapidly as it should be.

So your card, "For God's sake hurry up," ought to be sent not to Congress but to the department responsible for the delay.

Stop a moment and think of what Congress has done: It has raised taxes, authorized the sale of bonds, and provided for the issuance of certificates of indebtedness, so that during the first year of the war up to April 6, 1918, we received from the first sale of—

Liberty bonds	$1,986,625,405.57
From the second liberty loan	3,807,736,299.19
From certificates of indebtedness less certificates redeemed	3,266,649,500.00
From war-savings certificates and thrift stamps	146,617,316.33
From excess-profits tax	1,226,000,000.00
From corporation income tax	535,000,000.00
From individual income tax	666,000,000.00
A total of	9,648,003,115.52

especially raised for war purposes. And this in addition to the ordinary revenues and customs receipts amounting to nearly a billion dollars to cover the ordinary expenses of the Government.

Not only have we raised that much, in actual cash, but—

We have appropriated the sum of	$18,396,361,267.59
In addition, the present session has appropriated another	3,327,727,797.35
Or a total appropriation of	21,724,089,064.94
Of this sum there has been loaned to the allies	4,748,829,750.00
Leaving a balance for our war purposes of	16,976,259,314.94

Can you realize that this nearly $22,000,000,000 is about six times as much as the entire Civil War debt when we emerged from that conflict?

And what is the result of all this vast expenditure? We have something over 200,000 fighting men in Europe to-day.

Out of this vast sum raised we have not spent up to date more than $9,000,000,000, and this, as I have stated, notwithstanding the awful extravagance that has been indulged in in our war efforts.

We should construct during 1918 not less than 15,000,000 gross tons of shipping. The most we can now possibly hope for is 2,500,000 tons, unless a radical change is made in our ship production.

Now, you must know that Congress is not responsible for this delay. We have voted money. It is ready to be used. Congress has done its work and has done it quickly. No appropriation bill has lagged in the slightest degree. No necessary power has been withheld. Of course we must take into consideration that we were wholly unprepared when we went into this war, and we will make all allowances that should be made for the lack of experience of those upon whom onerous duties were imposed. We will make all excuses that should be made for inefficiency. But when we have done this there is a vast field in which no allowance can justly be made, and a vaster field in which there is no excuse for the inefficiency manifested. If, therefore—and I speak this to the writers of these postal cards—you want to be of service to your country, do not follow the rule that has been adopted by so much of the press of the country of damning Congress when you should know, as the press must know, just where the fault lies. If you want to help your country, send your postals to the several boards upon which are imposed the duties of speeding up production. Say to the Shipping Board, "For God's sake, hurry up." Say to the men who are striking, "In the name of Heaven and patriotism, stop your strikes, stop your slacking, and produce to the full limit of your ability." Say that to these men who are threatening to go on a strike the 1st of May all over the country because the governor of California refuses to pardon a man whom the jury convicted of one of the worst crimes that has ever been committed in this country, the hurling of a bomb into a procession of men, women, and children, that killed immediately some ten or a dozen people and wounded and injured many others, a man whose reputation has been as that of a criminal for years in the State of California. Write your cards to those people and tell them for God's sake, do not go on a strike for such an ignoble cause as that. You will then be doing some good for your country.

Say to all of the department's, "For Heaven's sake, stop burning up the money raised by taxation and bonds as you have been doing during the last year." Say to them, "In Heaven's name, cease these strikes"; "Cease making thousands upon thousands of men who could be fighting for their country lieutenants and majors and colonels and paying them good salaries to do the ordinary work of a file clerk."

Say to them that there is no excuse on earth for its costing this country at least twelve times as much for each man in the field as it costs any of the other powers. Plead to them for activity and reasonable economy, and in the meantime your Congress will go right on performing its duty, appropriating every dollar that is necessary and doing everything that is necessary in the quickest possible time to facilitate our war progress. If Congress at times has seemed slower than you think it should be on the little matter of granting extraordinary and unheard-of powers to individuals, just remember that it has never lost a moment of time in hurrying up and putting into law every matter that has been necessary to production of war material to speed up. So let me answer you, in God's name, bring your influence to bear upon those who are responsible for the delay and not upon those who are appropriating and raising the funds for this war far more rapidly than they can be spent or squandered.

STANDING ROCK INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. STERLING. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably with amendments the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 131) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of annual installments on the purchase price for land in the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations and I submit a report (No. 403) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The Senator from South Dakota asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution just reported by him. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The first amendment of the committee was, on page 1, in line 7, after the word "approved," to strike out "May 29, 1908 (35 Stats., p. 460), entitled 'An act to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect'" and insert "February 14, 1913 (37 Stats., p. 675), entitled 'An act to authorize the sale and disposition of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect,'" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to extend for a period of one year the time for the payment of any annual installments due, or hereafter to become due, on the purchase price for land sold under act of Congress approved February 14, 1913 (37 Stats., p. 675), entitled "An act to authorize the sale and disposition of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, in the States of South Dakota and North Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 7, after the words "Provided further," to insert "That any entryman who has resided upon and cultivated the land embraced in his entry for the period of time required by law in order to make commutation proof, may make proof, and if the same is approved, further residence and cultivation will not be required: Provided further"; and in line 10, before the words "per centum," to strike out "four" and insert "five," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided further, That any entryman who has resided upon and cultivated the land embraced in his entry for the period of time required by law in order to make commutation proof, may make proof, and if the same is approved, further residence and cultivation will not be required: Provided further, That any and all payments must be made when due unless the entryman applies for an extension and pays interest for one year in advance at 5 per cent per annum upon the amount due as herein provided, and patent shall be withheld until full and final payment of the purchase price is made in accordance with the provisions hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota if this proposed legislation is applicable only to the Standing Rock Indian Agency, or is it general?

Mr. STERLING. It is applicable only to the Standing Rock Indian Reservation, and only to that part of the reservation which was opened to settlement in 1913, and not to that opened for settlement under the act of 1908.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of annual installments on the purchase price for land in the Standing Rock Indian Reservation."

TEST OF ORDNANCE.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Committee on Naval Affairs met this morning and authorized me to report favorably and without amendment the bill (H. R. 10783) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to increase the facilities for the proof and test of ordnance material, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 402) thereon. The necessity for the passage of the bill is very urgent, and I ask for its immediate consideration. There is a letter from the Secretary of the Navy accompanying the report of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill just reported by him. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. JONES of Washington. Let the bill first be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to expend the sum of $1,000,000, or any part thereof, in his discretion, for the purpose of increasing the facilities for the proof and test of ordnance material, including necessary buildings, construction, equipment, railroad, and water facilities, land, and damages and losses to persons, firms, and corporations resulting from the procurement of the land for this purpose, and also all necessary expenses incident to the procurement of said land: Provided, That if such lands and appurtenances and improvements attached thereto can not be procured by purchase within one month after the passage of this act the President is hereby authorized and empowered to take over for the United States the immediate possession and title of such lands and improvements, including all easements, rights of way, riparian, and other rights appurtenant thereto, or any land selected by him to be used for the carrying out of the purposes of this act. That if said land and appurtenances and improvements shall be taken over as aforesaid, the United States shall make just compensation therefor, to be determined by the President, and if the amount thereof so determined by the President is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to the said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code. Upon the taking over of said property by the President as aforesaid, the title to all such property so taken over shall immediately vest in the United States. For the purposes of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That no railroad shall be built in the District of Columbia under this act until Congress has approved the point from which such road may start and also the route to be followed in the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. SMOOT. I move the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3783) to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. THOMAS. Reserving the right to object, I ask that the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. This is a measure of great importance, and I think there ought to be a quorum present when it is considered. Therefore I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the general pension act of May 11, 1912, is hereby amended by adding a new section, to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That from and after the passage of this amendment the rate of pension for any person who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War, now on the roll or hereafter to be placed on the pension roll and entitled to receive a less rate than hereinafter provided, shall be $30 per month. In case such person has reached the age of 72 years and served six months, the rate shall be $32 per month; one year, $35 per month; one and a half years, $38 per month; two years or over, $40 per month: Provided, That this amendment shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, still reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the Senator from Utah what additional aggregate burden will be placed upon the Treasury in the event that this amendment to the law should pass?

Mr. SMOOT. Approximately $40,000,000 for the first year. For each succeeding year the amount will be greatly reduced, as I shall show from letters I have received from different sources, and I think that the Pension Bureau themselves have figures which will demonstrate the accuracy of the statement I shall make.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not feel that we should, except in the direst emergency, impose such an enormous additional burden upon our ordinary expenditures; and I am therefore compelled to object to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not ask for unanimous consent. I moved to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3783?

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3783) to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not intend to take the time of the Senate in discussing this bill further than to give a few facts in the case to be considered as a report, as I promised to make at the time I reported the bill to the Senate.

This bill was reported unanimously from the Committee on Pensions by every member present, both Democrats and Republicans. I wish to say that I have hundreds of resolutions from the different Grand Army of the Republic organizations of the United States approving this bill. It is true that many veterans think it does not go far enough, but I believe that the rates fixed in the bill will at least partly compensate the veterans for the increase in the cost of living that has taken place since the passage of the act of May 11, 1912.

When that act was passed I never expected to ask Congress again to increase the rate of pensions for the Civil War veterans, but since that act was passed the cost of living has greatly increased, much more than the increase in pensions that is asked in this bill. Again, I know that the veterans of the Civil War, when the act of May 11, 1912, was passed, stated time and time again through their organizations that the rates provided in that act would be the last request they would make for an increase in pensions. The only excuse they offer or could offer for the change is that the cost of living has mounted so high that with the condition they are in physically, and the amount of pension that they are receiving to-day, it is absolutely impossible for many of them to keep body and soul together.

When we take into consideration the legislation that Congress has passed caring for the soldiers that are fighting or will fight, perhaps, in this world war, the rates of pension provided for in this bill are a bagatelle compared to what the soldier of to-day will receive in case of injury, or his dependents in case of death.

We must also take into consideration the fact that there are nearly 150 veterans dying every day, and when 12 months shall have passed that 150 deaths per day will be increased to over 200; and when the year 1926 arrives, under the figures of all life insurance companies as to the rates of death, the mortality tables, there will be none of the veterans left.

I know that this bill carries an increase of $40,000,000 for the first year, and I know that when the act of May 11, 1912, became a law there was an increase then of about the same amount, and our pensions then amounted to nearly $190,000,000 a year. Since then so many deaths have occurred that, notwithstanding the increases that have been made by thousands of special acts, our pension appropriations have decreased from that amount to about one hundred and fifty-odd million dollars. I trust that Congress will see that the last days of our war veterans are robbed of hunger and actual want; and if this small increase of pension granted to them will bring that about, I know that the American people from one end of this country to the other will approve.

I recognize, Mr. President, that this is a time to scan appropriations most carefully; and I want to say now that we could have appropriated $40,000,000 less in many of the bills that have passed without doing an injustice to the country, and thus we could have saved that amount of money to take care of the worthy defenders of the life of our Nation.

Mr. President, for the information of the Senate only, I wish to call attention to the number of veterans left in the United States, showing how rapidly they are passing away when we compare the number that are living to-day with the number that drew pensions but six years ago.

Of those who are less than 72 years of age who served 90 days and over, and those 72 years and over who served less than 6 months, there are but 2,171 alive. That, Mr. President, was on February 15 of this year. There is a smaller number than that to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat those figures?

Mr. SMOOT. There are 2,171 of that class.

Mr. NORRIS. Of what age?

Mr. SMOOT. Less than 72 years of age who served 90 days and over and 72 years of age and over who served less than 6 months.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the Senator might add one to that number and make the list complete. I am not drawing a pension, but would be entitled to it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, Mr. President, and I think there are others in the United States in the same position as the Senator from Minnesota, but I will say that they are few in number.

The number of those 72 years and over who served six months and less than one year is 39,163.

The number 72 years and over who served one year and less than one and a half years is 42,083.

The number 72 years and over who served one and a half years and less than two years is 24,785.

The number 72 years and over who served two years and over is 111,739.

Making a total of 299,941.

Mr. President, I do not believe it is necessary to discuss this question further. I believe that Congress has but to have its attention called to the condition, and it will vote willingly to take care of the Civil War and Mexican War veterans who are still living for the few years that they have yet to live.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ascertain a few facts from him. The bill was considered by the committee before I became its chairman, and I was not in attendance at the session in which the bill was under consideration.

I want to inquire of the Senator if any report was made on the bill other than the formal favorable report?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; there was no report made on the bill, and at the time I reported the bill to the Senate by instructions of the committee I said that whenever the bill was brought up for consideration I would make a statement as to the number of pensioners affected, and as to the cost that the bill would impose upon the Government if it should become a law.

Mr. WALSH. Let me ask the Senator if the bill was referred to any department for consideration?

Mr. SMOOT. The bill was referred to the Commissioner of Pensions, and I will state that I have a copy of the letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, and if the Senator desires I will ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to have that done.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that this letter be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I merely wish to suggest that a bill proposing to fix an annual charge of $40,000,000 on the Treasury certainly ought to be accompanied by a written report, and by the report of the proper department of the Government, so that the Senate of the United States may have some knowledge with regard to the bill. I have no knowledge whatever of the bill, and I see here hardly anybody on the Democratic side, and on the Republican side very few Members, indeed. I think this matter ought to be treated in the usual way, by having a printed report, in order that the Senate may have the benefit of its consideration before the bill is disposed of.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator, I will read the letter that I have just asked to have printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana further yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read it in order that the Senator may have the information that comes from the department.

Mr. OWEN. The point to which I call attention is that the Senator, by reading that letter now and making a verbal report with regard to this bill, does not reach the Senate. There is practically nobody here.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, that is generally the case with all legislation. The Senator from North Carolina called for a quorum before the question of taking up the bill was even presented to the Senate, and I would have done the same thing if the Senator from North Carolina had not done it. But day after day we discuss legislation of the most important character—far, far more important than this bill—with scarcely half a dozen Senators in the Chamber; and it seems to me there is no reason why this bill should be pointed to as something unusual because of the fact that we are discussing it with only 16 Senators in the Chamber.

Now, Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will yield further, I should like to read this letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.
Washington, February 15, 1918.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the letter of the clerk of your committee to the Commissioner of Pensions, dated the 7th instant, transmitting a copy of Senate bill 3330, to amend the act of May 11, 1912, granting pensions to survivors of the Civil War and the War with Mexico, with request for a report supplemental to that of the 26th ultimo showing the number of pensioners in each class and the probable cost of the bill, if enacted into law, with the age of 72 years substituted for the age of 75 years.

The bill thus amended proposes a rate of $30 per month to persons who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War, and to such persons reaching the age of 72 years who served six months a rate of $32 per month; 1 year, $35 per month; 1½ years, $38 per month; 2 years or more, $40 per month.

The roll carries no class of survivors rated upon attained age of 72 years. It was ascertained by running through several thousand roll cards that about 75 per cent of the survivors pensioned upon the basis of attained age of 70 years were now between the ages of 72 and 75 years. The results of addition of this percentage of the 70-year class on the roll at the close of the last fiscal year to the 75-year class then on the roll by periods of service and computation of the difference in annual rates at that time and the rates proposed by the bill are shown in the following tabulation:

Age and length of service.	Number.	Increased cost per year.
Less than 72 years and served 90 days and over, and 72 years and over and served less than 6 months	2,171	$10,670,202
72 years and over and served 6 months and less than 1 year	39,163	5,099,178
72 years and over and served 1 year and less than 1½ years	42,083	6,209,772
72 years and over and served 1½ years and less than 2 years	24,785	4,165,542
72 years and over and served 2 years and over	111,739	15,959,208
Total	299,941	42,104,202

The average annual increase is about $140. Allowance for death losses and other changes may be accepted to reduce the above total to $40,000,000 as representing the approximate cost of the bill for the first year should it become a law.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the letter read apparently is a reply to an inquiry for detailed information as to the operation of such an act and the expense to the Government which it would entail. It does not appear to have been recommended by the department. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct; and I wish to say also to the Senator that the department has never, to my knowledge, recommended the passage of any pension legislation, as other departments do in relation to legislation affecting them. In other words, the Pension Bureau has never initiated pension legislation, whereas almost all of the other departments draw the bills affecting their departments asking for the legislation, and they approve of it before the committees act upon it.

Mr. WALSH. I am simply addressing these questions to the Senator in an endeavor to gain the information which I should have endeavored to elicit had I been present at the meeting of the committee at which the bill was considered. I want to inquire now of the Senator if the measure has been asked for by any association of veterans?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not the Senator was in the Chamber at the time I made the statement, but thousands and tens of thousands of the veterans have asked, since the passage of the bill increasing the widows' pensions, that they be granted $50 per month. Mr. President, I could not see my way clear to introduce a bill of that character, and therefore I went to the officials of the Pension Department. I studied the question with them most carefully, and while they are in no position and I do not ask them to recommend pension legislation, I got the information from them which led me to believe that if the provisions of this bill became a law it ought to be all that the Grand Army of the Republic veterans should ask for under existing conditions. Since the introduction of the bill, I wish to say to the Senator that there have been hundreds of Grand Army of the Republic organizations throughout the United States that have adopted resolutions approving of this bill. Many of the resolutions in the body stated that they had hoped that $50 per month would be granted, but they recognize the situation as it exists to-day and approve of this measure, and stated that they would be satisfied with its passage.

Mr. CURTIS. May I make a suggestion here?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to state in line with what has been stated by the Senator from Utah that I have received a large number of resolutions passed by Grand Army posts in favor of an increase. Many of them have asked for a larger increase than is given in this bill. I will state also that I was on the Pension Committee for a number of years, and I never knew the Pension Office to recommend any measures. All that was asked of them was an estimate as to the amount a particular bill would carry.

I hope this measure may pass the Senate to-day.

Mr. WALSH. I gather from the answers made by both the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Kansas that some legislation of this character has been requested by a large number of Grand Army posts.

Mr. SMOOT. By nearly every post in the United States.

Mr. WALSH. That can hardly be correct; at least I have not been honored with any request from any post in my State for the legislation, and that is why I was prompted to make the inquiry.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that perhaps not having been chairman of the committee——

Mr. WALSH. It may be, however, that they directed their requests to the Senator from Utah rather than to myself.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say whether I have received resolutions from Montana or not. I have not the copies of the resolutions before me; but I know the statement I made was virtually correct, that nearly every organization in the United States has indorsed the bill. Further, I wish to say to the Senator that the representatives of the national organizations of the veterans residing in Washington and acting as the legislative committee of those organizations have approved of this measure, and not only that but they appeared before our Pension Committee. I think the hearings were printed, although I am not quite positive of that. They spoke in behalf of this measure, and there were members of the Pension Committee of the House present at that meeting. Unfortunately the Senator from Montana was ill at that time and out of the city; but I want to assure the Senator, and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] now sitting on the right of the Senator no doubt will bear me out in saying that the legislative committee as well as the national commander of the Grand Army of the Republic of the United States were present and spoke at that time in behalf of this measure. The commander stated that many of the veterans throughout the United States felt that there ought to be a flat rate of $50 per month for the surviving veterans; he himself recognized the situation and believed, and not only did he believe but he stated that he knew the passage of this bill would be satisfactory to the great body of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. President, I want also to say that at the time he was speaking to the committee he said "we as a body of veterans never expected to come to Congress again and ask for an increase over the rates provided in the act of May 11, 1912; but," he said, "the cost of living had mounted so high that it is absolutely impossible for the veterans, physically unable as they are to do manual labor, to keep the wolf from the door."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if this legislation were requested by any formal resolution of the national organization of the Grand Army of the Republic I should feel very much disposed to defer to any request they might make in the matter or any request that might be made in their behalf by any of the officers authorized to express their views in respect to the matter. I am glad to be advised by the Senator from Utah that some of the officers at least did appear before the committee and request the legislation. I was not aware of that fact and was not apprised by any of the Grand Army posts in my own State that this legislation was desired.

I content myself, Mr. President, at this time with asking that there be incorporated in the RECORD the first two paragraphs of the act of May 11, 1912, which this bill seeks to amend, in order that the public may be advised of the increases that it is proposed shall be made. I call attention to the fact that under the provisions of that law a person who has arrived at the age of 62 years and served 90 days becomes entitled to a pension of $13 per month. His pension is raised by this bill to $30. If he served 6 months he gets $13.50. It is raised to $30 by this bill. There are pensions provided dependent upon the period of service until he has served three years or over, when his pension becomes $16 per month; that is to say, the pension now provided by the bill for service in the case of those who have arrived at the age of 62 is raised from $13 to $16.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will yield I wish to say to him I do not think there is anyone to whom the age of 62 applies now left on the pension roll.

Mr. WALSH. That is quite probable.

Mr. SMOOT. There are only 2,171 under the age of 72 who are now left upon the pension roll.

Mr. WALSH. The pension provided in the existing law for one who has arrived at the age of 70 years is $18 per month, having served for 90 days; having served for 6 months it is $19 per month; having served for 1 year it is $20 per month, for 1½ years $21.50 a month, for 2 years $23 per month, for 2½ years $24 per month, and for 3 years or over $25 per month.

I ask that this be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

That any person who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the late Civil War, who has been honorably discharged therefrom, and who has reached the age of 62 years or over, shall, upon making proof of such facts, according to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may provide, be placed upon the pension roll and be entitled to receive a pension as follows: In case such person has reached the age of 62 years and served 90 days, $13 per month; 6 months, $13.50 per month; 1 year, $14 per month; 1½ years, $14.50 per month; 2 years, $15 per month; 2½ years, $15.50 per month; 3 years or over, $16 per month. In case such person has reached the age of 66 years and served 90 days, $15 per month; 6 months $15.50 per month; 1 year, $16 per month; 1½ years, $16.50 per month; 2 years, $17 per month; 2½ years, $18 per month; 3 years or over, $19 per month. In case such person has reached the age of 70 years and served 90 days, $18 per month; 6 months, $19 per month; 1 year, $20 per month; 1½ years, $21.50 per month; 2 years, $23 per month; 2½ years, $24 per month; 3 years or over, $25 per month. In case such person has reached the age of 75 years and served 90 days, $21 per month; 6 months, $22.50 per month; 1 year, $24 per month; 1½ years, $27 per month; 2 years or over, $30 per month. That any person who served in the military or naval service of the United States during the Civil War and received an honorable discharge, and who was wounded in battle or in line of duty and is now unfit for manual labor by reason thereof, or who from disease or other causes incurred in line of duty resulting in his disability is now unable to perform manual labor, shall be paid the maximum pension under this act, to wit, $30 per month, without regard to length of service or age.

That any person who has served 60 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States in the War with Mexico and has been honorably discharged therefrom, shall, upon making like proof of such service, be entitled to receive a pension of $30 per month.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The message also announced that the House further insists upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 44 to the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. LEVER, Mr. LEE of Georgia, Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, Mr. HAUGEN, and Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Mr. EVANS, and Mr. STAFFORD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 3388) to amend the emergency shipping fund provisions of the urgent deficiency appropriation act approved June 15, 1917, so as to empower the President and his designated agents to take over certain transportation systems for the transportation of shipyard and plant employees, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the legislative, and so forth, appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MARTIN, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. SMOOT.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I am just in receipt of a telegram from the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] requesting me to ask unanimous consent that further action on the conference report upon the Agricultural appropriation bill in reference to wheat be postponed until he returns to the city. He is absent attending the funeral of the late Senator from Louisiana, Mr. BROUSSARD, and I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there is objection to the contrary, the report will lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; I ask unanimous consent that it lie on the table until the Senator from Oklahoma returns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, it was developed on the last roll call that there were only 51 Senators present. Several Senators have told me that they have to leave. A good many are away making patriotic speeches and others are absent attending funerals or on official business. Therefore I ask, for I feel compelled to do so, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday at 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3783) to amend an act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers, and officers who served in the Civil War or in the War with Mexico," approved May 11, 1912.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have long since learned from unsuccessful experience that a Senator who opposes legislation of this sort, whatever his motive or the sincerity of his purpose may be, earns little support and less appreciation. Indeed, it is disagreeable to pose as an economist in any direction. So many demands are made upon the Public Treasury of a local and personal character that the practice of uniting these demands in what are called omnibus bills, so that the bill as a composite may represent them all and thus receive sufficient support to obtain a majority vote, only serves to increase the embarrassment of those who oppose them, particularly if the argument is to limit the expenditures of the Government. I say this, Mr. President, with no reflection upon anyone or upon either House, because I know what the influences behind these bills are, and how potent they become when directed to an objecting Senator or Member. As a consequence, it has become impossible to stem the tide of extravagance, of increased expenditure, and of consequent increased taxation.

I had hoped, however, Mr. President, that in such an emergency as now confronts us, when every dollar that can be raised by taxation or by loan is urgently needed by the Government, when our expenditures are reckoned no longer in millions but in billions of dollars, the evident necessity of economizing in every possible direction would be so potent as to compel a spirit of frugality with regard to domestic expenditures that would reduce them to the lowest possible minimum during the continuation of the war.

I had hoped, Mr. President, that consciousness of the fact that pay day must inevitably come and that our obligations are to be met through increased taxation would impel us from a sense of obligation to the producers of this country, who bear the burdens and pay the taxes, to place a limit upon our extravagance, or confine it to those emergencies so palpably evident every day and which are the outgrowth of the demands of war.

But, Mr. President, I must confess to a sense not only of disappointment but of discouragement. This is a wonderfully populous city at present. You can find everything in it except a spirit of frugality, a desire to save. Senators and Representatives are beset every day with schemes, propositions, and enterprises ostensibly necessary or desirable for the prosecution of the war, and presented from every direction having for their immediate purpose a Treasury appropriation, the larger the better, and the representatives and promoters of each scheme endowed with the notion that their particular enterprise must receive immediate financial consideration, if Germany is to be defeated. The employees of the Government in this emergency are unwilling to submit to the imposition of an eight-hour day, and Congress, in obedience to the demand that the present law remain unchanged, have finally submitted.

Demands for increased compensation come from every direction, and, so far as I am aware, in every instance they have been complied with. If there is a single instance the contrary, I trust that those having knowledge of the fact will correct me. The other day the Committee on Appropriations rejected a proposed sum in excess of $4,000,000 for the purchase of a valuable corner in this city upon which the Government is erecting a structure for public uses. Shortly afterwards by Executive allotment that sum was placed at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I understand the purchase to have been made. I do not criticize that instance; I cite it as an illustration, and I think an apt illustration, albeit a conspicuous one, of the manner in which the public funds are being used. It was doubtless regarded as essential, yet I think the judgment of the Congress regarding it should have prevailed.

I am surprised that a bill appropriating money for public buildings in different sections of the country has not by this time materialized; that communities which have not yet been blessed with expenditures for those structures should not get into the race "while the going is good," and seize the present opportunity for accomplishing that purpose. It will not surprise me, Mr. President, if such a bill shall materialize before this Congress is over; and it certainly will not surprise me to see it enacted into law.

The rivers and harbors bill—that gray-haired old sinner, whose capacious bosom has carried in days past many and many a successful scheme to secure unneeded money from the Treasury—is as active and vigorous as though it were within the draft age. It has passed the House of Representatives, and I have no doubt will soon knock at the doors of the Senate for immediate consideration, one reason for its immediate passage then to be urged being that it is demanded for "the successful prosecution of the war."

Mr. President, I wonder if any Senator in this Chamber, except the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], has ventured to make an estimate of the amounts of money so far appropriated by this Congress, and has contrasted the total sum with the revenues upon which we must rely to meet them. Perhaps even the Senator from Utah has not ventured that experiment thus far.

Mr. SMOOT. It is too early in the session to do so.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator says it is too early in the session, and I agree with him; but I imagine, Mr. President, the aggregate of those appropriations is far beyond our conceptions, extensive as they may be. It is too early to make such an estimate; and between this 19th day of April and the 4th of next July they may be beyond our present conception. I want to know where all this money is coming from, and to ask whether any of us has seriously considered the burden we are placing upon the taxpayers of the next generation?

Mr. President, we are on the road to national bankruptcy if we do not retrace many of our steps. Let us face the fact, and act accordingly. We can not sell liberty-loan bonds forever, for the great financial and industrial reservoirs of this Republic are not exhaustless; there is a limit, and that limit we are approaching. The people of the United States will pay their taxes; they will subscribe to liberty bonds just so long as it is within their financial power to do so, provided the money which they contribute is expended for the prosecution of the war. Many of them are now inquiring whether that is true, and many of them are justified in criticizing the character of some of our expenditures. Some are now showing reluctance to make further contributions until our methods of expenditure shall be, as some of them should be, corrected.

Mr. President, the mightiest empire of modern times is Great Britain. She is the wealthiest nation of all times, in proportion to her population; she is the creditor nation of the world. Her capital has been for centuries the nucleus of every great financial enterprise; her loans have been extended to every nation on earth; her capital was seemingly exhaustless; but, Mr. President, after fighting three years of a modern war, that mighty empire has called upon the United States at this hour to aid her in meeting her Indian obligations and to tide her over a serious situation. We have responded, as we should have responded and as we shall still respond, for the common cause of liberty and of freedom; but this situation should bring home to our minds the tremendous responsibility which we as Senators of the United States must assume and discharge in the appropriations which we shall make during these parlous times, lest the mighty structure of our credit shall also sink beneath the weight of a common burden and specie payments are suspended, as was necessary during the last years of the Civil War.

Is this a time, therefore, Mr. President, to add a fixed charge of $40,000,000 upon our annual budget unless that addition is absolutely necessary to our present objects and our present obligations? Is this a time to add a dollar to our fixed expenditures that can be properly and decently avoided?

Mr. President, that is what is proposed to be done by this bill, and I am unable to perceive any emergency whatever to justify it. I believe that away down in their hearts all Senators, whether present or not, very largely share that opinion, and I flatter myself that I am voicing their deliberate judgment regarding the expediency of this measure when I say that it ought not to be passed.

Mr. President, this country has been generous and overgenerous to the men who have fought to preserve it. The Government has extended its pension system from time to time, both by general and by special legislation, until every man, including many who have no right whatever to the largess of the Government, and the widow of every man enrolled upon the military records of the Nation during the Civil War have been made its beneficiaries. No demand which I can recall has ever been made, except in a few isolated individual instances, which has not met ultimately with a favorable response. I say "demand," Mr. President, because that is what I conceive these bills to be. They come from a great and powerful organization, which at times has not hesitated to intimate the political power which it wields, to the end that its displeasure may be averted by compliance with its requirements.

Since I have been a member of the Committee on Military Affairs I have had occasion to examine many bills of an individual character whose purpose was to remove the disabilities of the individuals mentioned in them, to the end that they might go upon the pension rolls, and I am sorry to say that in a large number of instances those bills have been favorably reported and favorably acted upon, in consequence of which many men dishonorably discharged from the service have been given the same status as those who enlisted for the war and who fought to the end.

What is the proper conception of a pension system? Does every man who takes up arms for his country impose a contract obligation upon it for his support ever after? Does every man who fights for the Republic do so because of the financial reward which may come and which does come in the form of pensions? I do not want to believe it, and yet, Mr. President, the history of pensions in the United States discloses a mercenary side, which it is difficult to reconcile with the lofty spirit of patriotism. Democrats and Republicans, as they have from time to time alternated in control of this Government, have competed with each other in the alacrity with which they have met these demands, and have claimed all the political advantage that could be reaped therefrom, just as they are now competing with the organized civil service of the United States to secure their political support through the medium of similar legislation.

Mr. President, I deny the general proposition—and I think I can successfully do so—that pensions are given for the purpose of supporting families or individuals, except in rare instances where great disability resulting from wounds or from insidious disease contracted during service renders the recipient incapable of caring for himself. A pension is a badge of honor, or it was in the days gone by, and I wish it could be said that it was a badge of honor now, but when given indiscriminately to everybody whether serving 90 days or 3 years, whether on the field or in the departments, whether in the ranks or in the Quartermaster's Bureau, the contribution is robbed of its aspect of honorable distinction and sinks to the level of commercialism.

I have had occasion, Mr. President, several times, to oppose, as best I could, appropriations which seemed to me to be extravagant or unnecessary. The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has cooperated, except upon occasions when pensions were involved, and then I have noticed that the Senator's principles of economy always yield to the demands of the pensioner.

Mr. SMOOT. Civil War pensioners.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, no; I will not confine my criticism—my "comment" perhaps I should say—to Civil War veterans, for I recall that the Senator was extremely active in securing the extension of the law giving pensions to men engaged in Indian warfare, not only during the Civil War but before and after, some of the campaigns occurring before the Civil War being of questionable merit to me; but the bills have gone through. I regret, therefore, that the Senator, with his ability, his tenacity, and his unapproachable industry, not only in his attention to senatorial duties but to his private affairs, is not with me upon this occasion, because I know that if he were there could be but the one outcome to this bill.

Mr. President, if I understand the basis upon which this bill is to be supported, it is that, owing to the increased cost in living, the beneficiaries of the proposed legislation are unable, because of their age and their lack of resources, to meet present-day conditions and may, therefore, suffer greater or less hardship. To that there are two answers. The first is that the proposed increase is insufficient for such a purpose. I believe that the maximum pension to be granted is $40 a month. There are some, perhaps, who can live upon that amount of money. The man who can do it at present, however, is to my mind as distinct a patriot as the man who is carrying a musket in the French trenches. The man who upon $40 a month can support a wife, to say nothing of children, deserves a medal equivalent to the French Croix-de-Guerre. He exhibits a degree of self-denial and of heroism that should stand as a shining light in these days of crass materialism and selfishness. It is occasionally done, but not very frequently. Hence we are not pretending here to give the beneficiaries of this bill any sum of money which is equivalent to their needs, provided—and I must assume that to be the fact—that they are reliant upon the largess of the Government.

The other answer is this: At the request of the members of the Grand Army of the Republic—and that request has always met with a warm response in my bosom—the Government of the United States and the States, respectively, have built a long chain of soldiers' homes, endowed and supported at the public expense, comfortable and attractive, to which every veteran of the war, whether he fought for the North or for the South, may have access in his old age at any time he desires. I was very much surprised some time ago to receive a letter from a constituent of mine asking me to introduce a bill to double his pension, because he said if it was not doubled he would have to go to a soldiers' home, and he did not want to endure the disgrace and humiliation of entering a sanctuary built for that express purpose so long as it was possible for him to be supported by the Government outside of it. I know that to a proud man such a refuge does not appeal very strongly; but these are far different from other institutions of similar character. These have stamped upon them not only in the legislation itself and in the requests upon which they were based but in the manner of their operation, a difference which means all the distinction between the enjoyment of an honest livelihood and the acceptance of alms and pittances from the public. Consequently, I am out of sympathy—I must be out of sympathy—with that sentiment which, after these homes have been instituted, sees disgrace and humiliation in taking advantage of them.

Mr. President, in these days when we are expending money by billions of dollars, and when our daily outlay is greater than the sum necessary to pay all the annual expenses of the Government during the early years of its existence, forty millions does not seem to be very considerable. To the Treasury of the United States that is a bagatelle, but considered in the abstract the sum is prodigious; and when we consider that the annual pension charge under existing laws mounts up to something like $200,000,000, the addition of 20 per cent, or forty millions more, gives one a fair idea of what the sum stands for.

Forty million dollars, at $10,000 a mile, would build 4,000 miles of railroad, and there are very few institutions outside of the great transportation companies and the great steel and other combinations whose capital comes anywhere near the sum of $40,000,000. Some of the States have revenues very far less than that sum. Indeed, I may say with perfect truth that the majority of the States enjoy annual revenues nowhere near that amount of money.

Where is it coming from, for this is but one of many items in our list? Why should we legislate now for this increase of expenditure? I think I am correct in saying that every appropriation bill so far becoming a law and every appropriation bill pending in the committees show increases over those of the last fiscal year. Many of them contain items that are novel, in the sense that they have not appeared in previous appropriation bills. Where is the money coming from to meet these new obligations, in addition to the vast sums that we are raising for our immediate pressing necessities?

It must be raised either by way of loans, which means a deferred debt, or by way of taxation, which means immediate sacrifice. I think the total assessed valuation of the property of the United States amounts to something like two hundred thousand millions of dollars. Our expenditures up to the present time are desperately near twenty thousand million dollars, and a year from now they will be two or three times that sum of money. We must either pay the score or we must repudiate it. Which shall we do? Which must we do when the time comes for final action?

It does not concern me, except in so far as my duties require me to speak of it, because I have nearly reached the period of threescore and ten, and there is a time when all activity ceases; but I am concerned for posterity, for nations are led into bondage more frequently by the burden of debt than through the power of the sword. Nevertheless we are going right ahead here expending money for all conceivable objects upon the theory that they are immediately necessary for the public good.

Mr. President, one afternoon during the discussion of the Agricultural appropriation bill, and immediately after an unsuccessful attempt to do away with what seemed to me to be a wholly unnecessary appropriation, I became possessed with a spirit of cynicism, so I took my pen at the desk here and sketched the outlines of a fable. I might well close this discussion by reading it:

A FABLE.

"Once upon a time, when Uncle Sam was youthful, he had to make his own way in the world. He was therefore careful to live within his income. Being thrifty, he amassed wealth sufficient for all his purposes, albeit these were many. In those days his money vaults were guarded by faithful and courageous animals called 'watchdogs of the Treasury.' Then, as now, Uncle Sam's increasing family was divided into factions bearing attractive and inspiring appellations. He committed the management of his affairs first to one and then to another of these factions as their changing preponderance in numbers required. Each of these factions championed economy with great vociferation, and each claimed a monopoly of the virtue. Both had their watchdogs, who succeeded with their masters in the guardianship of the Treasury. Hence, Uncle Samuel took no great concern as to the safety of his strong box, and especially since the watchdogs on duty were watched in turn by the dogs in temporary retirement.

"Moreover, each of Uncle Sam's factions contended that its watchdogs were the only thoroughbreds, and those of the opposition were mongrels and coyotes masquerading as dogs of pedigree. Uncle Sam was pleased with this situation, since theft or misappropriation would be detected and exposed by factional self-interest, promptly followed by an early and complete substitution of watchdogs.

"As time progressed, these great factions established the custom of holding quadrennial 'pride and alarm' meetings. They were so called because the factions at these meetings always paraded their own virtues and watchdogs with great pride and viewed the vices of the other faction and its watchdogs with great alarm. They also compared each his own economies in past administration of Uncle Sam's fiscal affairs with the reckless extravagances of the other faction. So common has this formula become that it has persisted down to this hour. No 'pride and alarm' meeting of either faction would be complete were these terms eliminated from its public announcements.

"These watchdogs guarded the Treasury and watched each other with great success for many years. Through the mutual rivalry and suspicions of their owners Uncle Sam's accumulations waxed fat and became more and more alluring. As time passed, and these accumulations multiplied, the financial virtue of the factions was gradually but surely disintegrated by the temptation to divide and enjoy them. They gazed more and more avidly at the vaults which contained them, and more and more reproachfully at their vigilant watchdogs keeping sentinel over them. The barriers of their moral resistance finally yielded to the unremitting pressure of opportunity. So the watchdogs were gradually toiled away from the Treasury portals and tied in the backyards, where they were starved and their breed finally extinguished. Canines of different quality have been substituted for them. They watch the Treasury, but only to ascertain whether anything is left in it or about to be put in it. They do not watch those who need watching, but they watch for them. Their olfactories quiver with no sense of the possible proximity of marauders, but with the joy of a prospective continuous feast, whose abundance may partially satisfy the insatiate demands of their unappeasable appetites.

"Theirs is the policy of 'the open door,' and the more doors the better, and the fecundity of the breed is beyond computation. It multiplies but does not replenish the earth. They can not be classified as a species, for their shapes are protean. They have just one line of vision, and that embraces the Federal Treasury. Their motto is 'Let no guilty dollar escape.' Their pretexts for public contributions are countless as the sands of the seashore. They are as prolific of them as Germany is of spies. In their progress toward Treasury exhaustion they have sheltered under the roof of the National Treasury all the birds of the air, the beasts of the field, the fishes of the waters under the earth, and the multitudinous swarms of insectivorous life. They inspire Federal employees and men who heard the guns of the enemy from cloistered sanctuaries during the Civil War to help themselves and welcome. They have devised revolving funds which do not revolve and can not do so. They are incapable of turning over. They are called revolving funds because they are all large, round ones. But their spheres become segments as soon as they emerge from the Treasury doors.

"The war has quadrupled the breed and multiplied their pretexts many fold. Discovering and utilizing them constitutes the principal source of competition between Uncle Samuel's factions. The things which have become and are becoming necessary, or which are said to contribute to the successful prosecution of the war, enhance within their scope the Garabed scheme to harness natural energy and purchases of imaginary homes for homeless Indians. The hungry, howling, clamoring pack has surrounded the Treasury, burrowed under it, and swarm all over the roof.

"Time is fleeting. It creates opportunities, but it bears them along its hurrying tides. This war is opportunity, and all wars must end some time. Hence, other avenues to the money vaults, all of them either necessary or contributing to the prosecution of the war, must be devised and pressed to the limit right now. The field has been pretty thoroughly gleaned, but here and there a stray peppercorn may be uncovered and developed. It may still be possible to secure appropriations to teach the taxpayer the difference between pulling his tooth and pulling his leg, and why he should howl at the one and smile at the other; to investigate the habits and hereditary tendencies of the tumblebug and the lightning bug, and ascertain why the one pushes in one direction and looks in the other, while the latter hangs his lantern upon his rear and then flies ahead; to study the vagaries of the lobster, and make him quit blushing when he is boiled; to develop eating crow from an infliction to a pleasure; to study the habitat and the anatomy of the skunk and teach him to use only blank cartridges in polite society; to devise plans for abolishing toil and making idleness productive; to study the maladies of the skin and ascertain why measles break out and shingles strike in. Other suggestions occur to the mind, but let these suffice as specimens.

"Every fable should involve a moral. This is an exception. It dimly suggests that watchdogs must watch out lest they be trampled by the multitude, and that political parties should always wink the other eye when quadrennially denouncing each other for squandering public money with reckless extravagance."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Chamberlain	Harding	Nelson	Thomas
Culberson	Henderson	New	Tillman
Cummins	Hollis	Norris	Townsend
Curtis	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Underwood
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Walsh
Fall	Kellogg	Saulsbury	Warren
Fletcher	Lodge	Sheppard	Watson
France	McCumber	Shields	Williams
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Smith, Md.	Wolcott
Gallinger	McNary	Smoot

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is absent in the liberty-loan campaign.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] are detained in attendance on the funeral of the late Senator BROUSSARD. I wish also to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is necessarily absent, owing to illness.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] are detained in attendance on the funeral of the late Senator STONE. I also wish to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] are detained, taking part in the third liberty loan campaign.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names, not a quorum. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BRANDEGEE, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. TRAMMELL answered to their names when called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names, not a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. It is quite evident that we are not going to be able to maintain a quorum, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. I think we can secure a quorum if the Senator will allow a motion to be made to direct the Sergeant at Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. THOMAS. Very well; I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

After a delay of a few minutes,

Mr. SMOOT. From information I have received since the order was issued by the Senate it will be impossible to secure a quorum. I do not want to hold Senators here longer knowing that to be a fact. Therefore I ask that the order of the Senate requesting the attendance of absent Senators be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. OVERMAN. There are reasons for the absence of Senators. Many Senators are absent on official business and others on patriotic business during the week end. Therefore I feel compelled to move an adjournment. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 22, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 19, 1918.

The House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. KITCHIN, at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We invoke Thy blessing, Almighty Father, upon this body of representative men, here for the purpose of enacting laws for the guidance of a great and growing people, now engaged in a struggle for human rights.

Grant that in all their deliberations they may be actuated only by the highest considerations of right, truth, justice, equity; in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the table the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I observe that in making the appropriation for clerk hire for Senators the Senate has made great increases. The increase is attempted in two ways. One by paying clerks salaries from the contingent fund, thereby increasing the contingent fund of the Senate by a good many thousand dollars. Then by direct appropriation the number of their clerks is increased. Already each Senator, as I recall, has about $4,800 for clerk hire. Take the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, for example. As I recall the facts, that committee has clerk hire aggregating about $8,000, speaking only in round numbers. By this new arrangement the Finance Committee of the Senate, the similar committee in that body, has clerk hire aggregating about $14,000 or $15,000. Everyone knows that bills coming from this committee must originate in the House, and without any disparagement of the great work done by the Finance Committee of the Senate, I think it is safe to say that at least as much work is done in the Committee on Ways and Means of the House as is done by the Finance Committee of the Senate. Why then this discrepancy in clerk hire? Just at this time when every one is being called upon to give financial support to the Government, it does seem to me that the legislative branch of the Government ought to conserve where it can. I was surprised to learn what the Senate had done in this respect, and I wanted to ask the gentleman whether or not he would be willing to bring these items back to the House and give us opportunity to consider them, inasmuch as the Senate a year ago absolutely brushed aside the rule, that had hitherto obtained, by which the House would regulate its affairs so far as its expenditures were concerned, and the Senate would regulate its. The Senate violated that rule last year, and I understand that now we have a perfect right to inquire into these increased appropriations for clerk hire so far as that body is concerned.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does that increase apply to all of their clerks over there or only to the Finance Committee?

Mr. GOOD. It applies to all of them.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in so far as the Finance Committee of the Senate is concerned, the gentleman is evidently referring to the bill that was reported from the committee. There was a considerable increase recommended by the committee, but that was stricken out on motion of the committee in the Senate. It was not agreed to. I do not find that there is any increase in the bill as it passed the Senate for the clerical force of the Finance Committee. It is true that the Senate has considerably increased the expenditures for clerical services for Senators.

Mr. GOOD. I could not get a copy of the bill as it passed when my attention was called to it by the remarks of Senator MARTIN, made on the floor of the Senate, from which it appeared that action had been taken very materially increasing the clerk hire of the Senate. I would ask the gentleman if that is not correct?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is correct. There is an increase in the bill as it passed the Senate of something over $26,000 to provide clerks for Senators who are not chairmen of committees. That is over and above the appropriation of the current year of $105,600 for a similar purpose. Then I understand the Senate has adopted a resolution providing for an extra clerk for each Senator at $1,200 per year, to be paid out of the contingent fund. That is my understanding.

Mr. GOOD. Formerly the contingent fund of the Senate was $50,000. That was increased to $140,000, of which $40,000 was to be immediately available, which was to pay for the increased clerk hire up to the 1st of July.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman assumes that, and he may be entirely correct. I do not know just why they need the $40,000 now unless it be to meet the expenditures required under that particular resolution. I may say to the gentleman that the resolution adopted by the Senate, I suppose, expires by limitation on July 1, and it would probably be necessary to adopt another resolution for next year.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a few observations?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the matter to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has referred—that of the practice of economy by the House in the matter of clerks, whereas the Senate is quite liberal toward its own Members in that respect—it should be remembered that there are some Members here who represent an entire State, who have the same responsibilities in regard to looking after the affairs of their people that two Senators have. There are also States in which there are the same number of Members that there are Senators.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In a moment. It has occurred to some of us that this situation should be taken into consideration—not that there should be any effort to discriminate or differentiate in favor of the Members so situated, but at least that is a matter that is entitled to consideration in connection with the question of clerks and clerk hire. I see several gentlemen before me, on the other side, who are from States having no more Members than Senators. In view of such representation, it is to be assumed they have quite as much to do as a Senator in the way of correspondence and attention to affairs in their districts. Gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol seem to think that they are entitled to clerk hire and assistance to the tune of $5,000 and upward. The notion of economy seems to be confined entirely to the House, where the maximum allowance to a Member without a committee is $2,000. I do not care to refer to my own experience in that regard, but it illustrates a situation such as I have referred to. I have been laboring under the disadvantage of having an allowance of only $1,500 per annum for clerk hire until very recently; now it is $2,000. As the Representative of an entire State, I think I have as much work and correspondence as a Senator from any State. I do not assume the Senators have too great an allowance, but they have almost treble our allowance for clerk hire.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Tennessee has the floor. With his permission I will yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Did not the Senate merely insist upon the clerks to Members of the House being placed upon the pay roll, and is not that the question that the Senate insisted upon?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, whether or not that was the question, I should say if it was, with all due deference to the honorable body at the other end of the Capitol, the House should decide and not the Senate.

Mr. DOWELL. Is not it also true——

Mr. MONDELL. Personally, I am entirely agreeable to that arrangement, and am, in fact, in favor of it, but it is an arrangement that the House should settle for itself.

Mr. DOWELL. Is not it also true, by reason of the increase of pay that was accorded employees, that the clerks of the Senate who were on the pay roll have been increased by reason of that legislation, and the clerks of the Members of the House are not affected by it and get no increase? Is not that true?

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Wyoming has made some reference to Members on the other side of the House who represent as much territory and as many people as Senators do. Of course, I know that he is aware of this fact, but because of his modesty would not express the hope, which we all indulge in on this side of the House with mingled feelings of regret and joy, that some of those gentlemen on our side may soon have opportunity to participate in this increased allowance for clerk hire in the other branch of the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. I am told there are gentlemen on this side and the other side who have such ambition, and I thank the gentleman on their behalf for his kindly words and wishes.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman will permit, I understand arrangements have been satisfactorily made to correct the situation in the next Congress in the State of Wyoming; so it does not apply to the State of Wyoming. [Applause.]

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Tennessee will permit me further, I will say that I have been looking through the bill, and I find it is a fact that the House did not increase, as I recall it, by a single dollar the amount which we have appropriated for clerk hire, including clerks, messengers for committees of the House; but the Senate for next year has increased this allowance by $128,000 and more. Now, it seems to me that a matter of that kind ought to be brought back to the House and we ought to have some reason for that stupendous increase. Certainly there will be no greater work on the part of the Senate correspondingly than there will be on the House for the next year over the past year.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman understands, of course, when questions arise as to appropriations of this character the claim is always made that each House should be permitted to settle that for itself. Now, personally, I do not entirely subscribe to that idea, because we all, of course, are responsible for these appropriations; but that has been the custom that has been adopted heretofore, and has usually prevailed. I would not like——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield? Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman from Iowa is through——

Mr. GOOD. I am through.

Mr. COX. I want to ask the gentleman who is in charge of this bill in regard to amendment 90, stricken out by the Senate, and particularly to what is known here as the Borland amendment, which was adopted, as I recollect, by a very large majority. I do not see the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] on the floor this morning.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question; yes.

Mr. KEATING. I wanted to ask the gentleman if the gentleman from Missouri had been on the floor since the Borland amendment had been adopted?

Mr. COX. Well, I do not know anything about that, but I think perhaps he may be away attending the funeral of Senator STONE. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not before the conferees between the House and the Senate agree on that Senate amendment if he will bring it back to the House and give it a chance to express its opinion upon it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Indiana, that, speaking for myself—and I believe the other conferees will agree with me as to that particular amendment—that inasmuch as it was passed on by the House and a record vote taken——

Mr. KEATING. No; the gentleman is mistaken; we have had no record vote on that proposition.

Mr. COX. We had a division vote.

Mr. KEATING. We had a division vote, but no record vote, because there was no opportunity to secure one.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My recollection was that we had a record vote, but the gentleman from Colorado corrects me——

Mr. KEATING. I mean by a record vote there was no yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. COX. Well, while there was no yea-and-nay vote, there was a division vote in the House, and I would like to ask the gentleman whether, as he is one of the members of the conference committee, he will bring that amendment back to the House and give it a chance to express its opinion upon it?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Well, in view of the difference of opinion that exists in the House as to whether or not that amendment should be adopted, and considering the debate that occurred during the consideration of this bill and the efforts made heretofore to adopt it, personally, I say to the gentleman, that I feel as if the House ought to have an opportunity to express itself one way or the other. I speak for myself as one of the conferees, and I assume that the other conferees will feel the same way about it. But I hope the gentleman will not insist upon any rigid promise to bring any particular amendment back.

Mr. COX. I will not.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Because I think the gentleman can rely on the fact that the conferees will undertake to the best of their ability to see that the wishes of the House are carried out.

Mr. COX. I think the House should have an opportunity to frankly express its opinion on that before the House yields to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. EMERSON. How much does the appropriation this year exceed the appropriation of a year ago?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The appropriation bill of a year ago carried, in round numbers, $39,000,000. The bill for next year, as it passed the House recently, carried a total of $69,500,000, and it carries over $70,000,000 as it passed the Senate.

Mr. EMERSON. It seems to me there should be a saving at this time, if possible. I have a letter from a constituent protesting against increasing expenses during the period of the war and expressing the opinion that we should confine ourselves to necessities. My constituent says:

APRIL 15, 1918.

Hon. H. I. EMERSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You will find inclosed the seeds which you sent me. These are war times, and the Government needs every cent to win the war.

We will all have to pay lots of tax and buy many bonds, but I, for one, am not for asking people to buy bonds to pay for seeds for Congressmen. Cut out the extras until after the war—forever would be better.

Very truly, yours, H. S. HART.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will understand that this large increase represents the salaries necessary to be paid to the greatly increased number of clerks who have been brought here on account of the war. It is a condition that would not exist in normal or peace times.

Mr. EMERSON. In this bill?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; in this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SANFORD. Reserving the right to object, the Senate has included an amendment providing for 50 additional policemen, and they insert the very peculiar provision that the appointment to these positions shall be made on account of efficiency and special qualifications. I would assume that all public officers were appointed on account of efficiency or special qualifications without that amendment, but I would like to ask the chairman if he has any idea as to how that efficiency or special qualification should be determined in selecting policemen to guard the Capitol at this time, and whether he intends to give the House a chance to express itself on that subject?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that there is no question in my mind but that at this particular time there is a necessity for an increased number of police to guard the Capitol and the Office Buildings. The gentleman will recall that it was omitted from this bill as it passed the House, for the reason that it was expected to make provision in the sundry civil bill for the appointment of additional police or guards through the Superintendent of the Capitol. The Senate seems to be of the opinion that those appointments should be made through the Sergeant at Arms of the respective Houses.

Mr. SANFORD. I will agree with the gentleman that there should be additional guards in the Capitol and should have been last year, but is there any reason why policemen should not be selected to guard the Capitol by the method which is now universally accepted as the only method of choosing policemen, namely, through the civil service? Should the Capitol of the United States be the one place in the United States where the patronage system is now used in the choosing of policemen?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is this reason, so far as this particular increase is concerned: These policemen who will be put on if the increased appropriation is made are temporary. In other words, it is not expected that they will be needed after the present condition of affairs has passed away, or after the war is over. This is simply an emergency provision.

Mr. SANFORD. Does the gentleman think that this Senate provision in regard to the selection of these particular policemen, that they should be appointed on account of efficiency and special qualifications, is a reflection on the policemen that we now have?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sure it is not a reflection. So far as I know, all our policemen are efficient.

Mr. SANFORD. Does the gentleman think it is a reflection on the House to maintain a police force at this time to guard the Capitol, a force which is appointed by the patronage system? Is there any city in the United States where policemen are now chosen in that way?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of that I am not advised.

Mr. SANFORD. It has been discredited all over the United States except in this Capitol.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I will have to ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]?

There was no objection; and the Speaker pro tempore announced as the conferees on the part of the House, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Mr. EVANS, and Mr. STAFFORD.

MAIL OF SOLDIERS AND SAILORS ABROAD.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the naval bill is taken up I desire to ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the matter of soldiers' mail is receiving the attention of Congress. It is natural, of course, that a soldier should desire to communicate with his relatives and that their relatives should desire to hear from the boys at the front. In this connection I send to the Clerk's desk to have read a letter which presents a very interesting, if not a startling, phase of this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL PRESS CLUB,
Washington, April 19, 1918.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MOORE: Here are the facts in the case we were discussing this morning.

Frank C. Dodge, 37 years old, born at Barrington, R. I., son of John W. Dodge, in the oyster business at Barrington for 45 years. Mr. Dodge's ancestry dates back to the early settlers of New England.

He was a member of the Seventh Cavalry during the Spanish War. He was 15 years captain of oyster boats and schooners in Narragansett Bay.

August 15, 1917, the United States Shipping Board established at Providence, R. I., a free Government nautical school to train seamen for officerships aboard the merchant marine. Mr. Dodge was one of the first volunteers to take this course. He graduated and was given a third mate's license.

He was assigned first to the Minnesota and made a trip across through the war zone.

On his second trip he was aboard the steamer Harry L. Luckenbach, and the Luckenbach was torpedoed on January 3, 1918, off the coast of France. He took to the lifeboats, and the German U-boat shelled the lifeboats. One shell hit the lifeboat in which Mr. Dodge had been taken. A piece of flying timber broke his left wrist and bruised several ribs on the left side. He was thrown into the icy water, and was in it for 3 hours and 40 minutes when picked up by a French torpedo-boat destroyer. He was taken to Nancy, France, and later transferred to a hospital in Paris for five weeks. After recovering sufficient strength, Mr. Dodge visited some of the towns and cities in France, and while in Saint-Nazaire, France, discovered, much to his delight, that many of the Rhode Island boys in the artillery regiments and motor corps were billeting in the town. Many of them requested that he bring back letters to their mothers, fathers, brothers, sisters, relatives, friends, and sweethearts. He brought over about 26 such letters, and on the back of these wrote, "Kindness of Officer Frank C. Dodge, West Barrington, R. I." He was happy to bring back a personal message to the folks here. Mr. Dodge delivered these letters, paying car fare out of his pocket, and found that the mothers, fathers, etc., were wild with joy to hear directly and personally from their sons.

On April 7 Officer Dodge, having recovered strength from his injuries, was back in New York ready to be assigned to another troop ship. He was informed that the Federal authorities in Providence were going to make a case against him for violating that section of the trading-with-the-enemy act prohibiting the bringing of uncensored letters to this country. He went back to Providence of his own accord to await any action that might be taken against him. He was arrested in Providence on a warrant charging him with bringing over uncensored letters and placed under a $5,000 bail. Of his own accord he told agents of the Department of Justice in Providence just where they could locate his baggage in New York City, and told them the names of the people to whom he had brought letters over. He attempted to conceal no information from the authorities, and frankly told them he did not know any such law existed, and that he was sorry if he had technically violated any law, and that in bringing over the letters he thought he was doing a bit of human kindness for brother fighting men and lifelong friends.

Now, the status of the case is that a warrant is against this man's good name, and the United States Shipping Board's officials in New York refuse to let Mr. Dodge sail in his country's transport service until the stigma which has been unjustly placed against his good name is eliminated. He has been held for the action of the Federal grand jury in Providence, which meets May 21. At first officials in Providence refused to permit him to sail until after the grand jury had considered his case, but finally, through the interest of many friends, the district attorney consented to let him sail. But the officials of the United States Shipping Board in New York having heard of the arrest refused to give him his shipping papers.

Respectfully, your friend,

JEROME STUART PRICE.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the writer of that letter is a member of the National Press Club, now attached to the staff of the Providence (R. I.) Journal.

I would not interfere with the ordinary course of the law. Whatever is the law should be enforced. But here is a case where warning should be given to the soldiers and sailors who are facing the dangers of war of the legal pitfalls that confront them if they attempt to communicate with their relatives on this side of the water in any manner except as laid down by the regulations of the Army and Navy. Here is a man with the qualities of a hero, who has done "his bit" for his country, and who must now suffer for it because out of the kindness of his heart he endeavored to bring tidings from his chums in Europe to the friends on this side who are longing to hear from their loved ones. His arrest is a part of the secret service system with which we have to deal in the United States. On the face of it, it seems harsh that such a man should be denied the further opportunity to serve his country. I desired to have the letter read as a note of warning——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two more minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I bring it to the House as a note of warning to all soldiers and sailors to be careful about their correspondence. They should be protected against a repetition of the Providence case.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill (H. R. 10854); and, pending that motion, I wish to see if we can make an arrangement with reference to general debate. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] if it would be agreeable to him, and also to the House, if he would join with me in a request to the House to dispense with all general debate and proceed with the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman make that request?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. In order that I may say a word, I will reserve the right to object. I do not propose to object, however, because I appreciate the urgency of this measure. But a number of gentlemen have asked me to secure time for them, and I promised to do it. So may I ask the gentleman to include in his request that after this bill has been passed and sent to the Senate general subjects may be discussed by this side of the House for two hours? A number of gentlemen who never consume any time in the House have something to say, and, appreciating their wishes, I made the promise that I would endeavor to obtain time for them. But within the last 24 hours we have been notified of the absolute urgency of the passage of this measure. If the gentleman will include that in his request, that will be entirely satisfactory. I will exclude next Monday, because I understand that has been set aside for another purpose.

It is desirable that we pass the naval appropriation bill as promptly as possible, discussing it under the five-minute rule and amending it where it should be amended, but that we send it to the Senate promptly, where the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee has assured us, after conversation with some of the Senators, that the measure will be considered by the Senate in a very, very short time. Will the gentleman be willing to add that to his request?

Mr. PADGETT. I want to say to the gentleman that my desire is to get immediate consideration of the bill, and to give an illustration to the country that we can take up a war bill and deal with it in a business way, and put it through without having outside discussion intervening to prevent the early and prompt passage of war measures.

Mr. BUTLER. It was for that very purpose that I made the proposition to defer the discussion of general subjects until after the passage of the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. So far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing, if it meets the pleasure of the House, to have two hours set aside for gentlemen on that side and two hours for this side, if it is desired, for the discussion of the state of the Union after this bill has passed. That practice prevailed in the early history of this House, and I believe that once since I have been a Member here there was a day set apart for discussion of questions under the state of the Union, upon the request of Mr. Galusha A. Grow.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I have here a memorandum of the requests made of me for time. If all these requests are complied with, we will need on this side of the House fully five hours' time, and I am assuming that there will be that much time needed on the other side. Now, I believe that all the members of the Naval Affairs Committee agree that we ought to move with the greatest expedition to secure the passage of this measure, and they have foregone any requests for time in general debate.

Mr. PADGETT. Would it be agreeable to the gentleman that a night session be held for the purpose of general debate?

Mr. BUTLER. I am not much in favor of night sessions.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Or Sunday! [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman from Tennessee has put a hard question to me. I would have to go around to these gentlemen to find out whether they would be willing to postpone their bedtime and stay here at night. I assume that if we go into this unlimited general debate we will not be able to reach the consideration of this bill under the five-minute rule before next Tuesday, and I know the gentleman from Tennessee will agree with all of us that expedition is the one thing necessary. When we get into the Committee of the Whole, we will be able to satisfy Members that the statement I have made is not an exaggerated one. These troops must be sent abroad, and they can not be sent until you pass this bill.

Mr. PADGETT. Did the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] desire to make a request?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Massachusetts desires to reserve the right to object. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that expedition in the passage of any measure is necessary. The request which has been proffered involves rather a revolutionary proceeding, particularly during recent days in Congress, namely, to pass a bill and then talk about it afterwards. Now, two hours for general debate after the bill is passed will take just as long, just as many minutes, as before the bill is passed, and after this bill is passed there are other measures of just as much urgency as this. I have gone over the bill fairly carefully, and I can not find very many appropriations which are to be immediately available. If this measure is passed by both branches of Congress and becomes a law by the 30th of June, that seems to be all that is necessary.

Mr. PADGETT. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment? Every appropriation in this bill is made available by a general provision at the end of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Then that is one of the few pages that I had not reached in going over the bill. Let me say to the chairman that I trust he will not plunge into the five-minute debate without himself making a short preliminary general explanation of the measure. Then after he does that, let us go ahead and read the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. PADGETT. The request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] was for debate upon matters not connected with this bill, in order that gentlemen might have an opportunity to speak upon other matters.

Mr. WALSH. I do not want them to talk about anything except the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. I know; but the gentleman asked for that, and under the rules they could speak upon matters not pertaining to the bill. I wanted to expedite the passage of the bill and to help the gentleman get permission that Members who desired to speak might do so at some other time.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, four of the gentlemen who made requests for time have sent word to me that they will not stand in the way of the immediate passage of this bill. Therefore I withdraw the request I made, and will ask the chairman to proceed as quickly as he knows how. [Applause.] I promise these gentlemen now that since they have been so generous in this matter I will endeavor to get them an opportunity to speak later.

Mr. WALSH. May I ask the chairman of the committee a further question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that it is the purpose, of course, to permit liberal discussion under the five-minute rule, as items of the bill are reached.

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly; so that every line of the bill may be clearly understood and intelligently acted upon by the House.

Mr. WALSH. And the gentleman desires to confine the discussion under the five-minute rule to the bill?

Mr. PADGETT. I do.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that a letter——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, H. R. 10854, and asks unanimous consent, pending that, that there be no general debate on the bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LUNN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if discussion will be limited to the bill?

Mr. PADGETT. It will.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say that unanimous consent has already been given for that. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule. General debate having been dispensed with, under the rules of the House debate must be confined to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. PADGETT. If I have the floor.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not the intention of the chairman to make a brief statement to the House as to the contents of the bill?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not think it is necessary. Any matter that comes up where information is desired I will be glad to give all the information I have. The bill has been on the calendar for three or four weeks with a full report as to the items and purpose of the bill, and I do not think it necessary to make any preliminary statement now.

Provided, That hereafter the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to consider, ascertain, adjust, determine, and pay the amounts due on all claims for damages to and loss of private property when the amount of the claim does not exceed the sum of $1,000, and occasioned and caused by men in the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States in European waters during the period of the present war, all payments in settlement of such claims to be made out of "Pay, Miscellaneous."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. May I ask the chairman of the committee if the last proviso in the paragraph is in accordance with the bill which passed the House earlier in the session with reference to losses of goods and effects of men in the Naval Coast Guard Service?

Mr. PADGETT. No; this is for the purpose of authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to do what a similar act that passed the House this session gave the Secretary of War with reference to the Army. It allows the Secretary of the Navy to adjust small damages that may be occasioned in the Navy to the people of France and citizens of France, limiting the amount not to exceed $1,000, instead of having those people send their claims over here to be presented in a special bill to Congress or trying to get into the Court of Claims.

Mr. WALSH. I recall the bill passed with reference to the Army and there was no limit.

Mr. PADGETT. There was not; but this is limited to $1,000.

Mr. WALSH. Why was the limitation placed in this proviso?

Mr. PADGETT. The Secretary thought it was well to limit the discretion and not give absolute power to adjust large claims. There might be a claim come up for many thousand dollars; for instance, the sinking of a ship, which might involve half a million or a million dollars. He did not think it was well, and did not ask for that unlimited power. This is for citizens that suffer small damages to private property.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I think the gentleman will remember that we found that a great deal of this damage came from ships of the Navy running into docks and into rowboats and things of that kind.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Did not we consider that this would very largely promote harmony among the allies?

Mr. PADGETT. Absolutely.

Mr. BUTLER. And would enable the Secretary to dispose of little claims without having to refer them to some tribunal?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. We did not want a state of feeling to grow up that the American ships and sailors had done injury and damage to private property of the allies, with no means of redress, and leave them in a dissatisfied and disturbed condition.

Mr. WALSH. Is there any special bill pending for this purpose?

Mr. PADGETT. No; there is not.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. A bill similar to this was passed the other day in reference to claims for damages arising out of the movement of troops in France.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; but that had no limit.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. No; but there was a proviso that limited the class of claims that might receive benefit to those that would be proper under the laws of the country in which the claim arose. There is nothing of that kind here.

Mr. PADGETT. This is limited to $1,000, and it is intended to take care of these minor things.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That was what the other was intended for.

Mr. PADGETT. No; because there was no limit in that.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The phraseology was without limit, but the discussion was entirely devoted to small incidental claims.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; but it might take in big ones. This is limited to $1,000, and it is intended to take care of many little things that may arise where a man is injured to the extent perhaps of $15, $20, or $25, so that he would not have to come over here and refer it to our tribunals.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 10783) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to increase the facilities for the proof and test of ordnance material, and for other purposes.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Temporary government for West Indian Islands: For expenses incident to the occupation of the Virgin Islands and to the execution of the provisions of the act providing a temporary government for the West Indian Islands acquired by the United States from Denmark, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1917, to be applied under the direction of the President, $200,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] a question or two in respect to this item. When the West Indian Islands were taken over under purchase there was consideration had as to how they should be controlled, whether by the civil or the naval authorities. I listened with much interest to the gentleman's very earnest statement to the House the other day when the river and harbor bill was under consideration in reference to a possible development for naval purposes of the Virgin Islands. From some remarks the gentleman made, but more particularly from remarks made by other distinguished members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which the gentleman is so able a chairman, I gathered it is not possible for the Navy Department ever to utilize the Virgin Islands as a naval base. If that is the case, there is no sense on earth why the government in control of those islands should remain in the Navy Department. Can the gentleman enlighten the House a little upon that? We had some consideration of this before the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the act of Congress taking over the Virgin Islands and providing for a temporary government placed them altogether under the President.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is the makeshift that we made.

Mr. PADGETT. That is the law now. The President placed the government under the Navy, and it appears it is being governed under the administration of the Navy Department. The island of Guam is governed in the same way.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But there is a great difference between the island of Guam and the Virgin Islands—as much as there is between the two poles of the Arctics—unless the Virgin Islands are going to be used for military purposes. I feel it is proper and just here to state that if it is not the purpose to use them for a naval purpose, then Congress and not the President should devise a scheme of government for the people of those islands. It is contrary to our scheme and system of government that they should be controlled by an Executive order.

Mr. PADGETT. That rests with the wisdom and desire of Congress as to when it will legislate for a permanent government. Under existing law it is under the control of the President. He could have placed the government of the islands under the War Department or, as he did, under the Navy Department or under any other of the departments. He saw fit to place the matter under the administration of the Navy Department.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman is entirely correct in that statement; but the point I wish to emphasize is this: It was expected when we passed that law—at least it was the expectation of some of us who helped to write the law or who consented to it as written—that it was temporary, and it was distinctly understood that perhaps within a year there would be presented to the Congress for its consideration a scheme for a permanent government of the islands. That has not yet arrived. Perhaps the disturbed condition of the world justifies its postponement. I rather think that is correct.

Mr. PADGETT. I think the gentleman is entirely correct in that assumption, that the disturbed conditions have so engaged along other lines that it is entirely proper for the President to continue the government under the Navy administration, regardless of the future government.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If we are justified in the assumption that these islands are not to be used for naval objects, Congress should be taking up the subject of a permanent government, and its character and kind and jurisdiction over them should go to the Committee on Insular Affairs. If it is to be used for military purposes, like Guam—and everybody knows that Guam exists under the American flag wholly because of its military value—then the government should be kept under the Navy Department.

Mr. BRITTEN. Guam is not being developed in a military direction.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But it is the earnest expectation of every one that Guam will be so developed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Not of every one. The same condition might be imposed upon the Virgin Islands. Some military activity may prevail there at some future date, just as it may occur in Guam, but the island of Guam is now administered under a governor general who is a naval officer. The same condition will prevail in the Virgin Islands, and I know that my good friend will agree that Guam is very properly administered.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Very properly, and the administration of it is exactly where it belongs, but I think the gentleman will see the difference. The island of Guam contains the only harbor in an area the radius of which is about 1,500 miles.

Mr. BRITTEN. A very poor harbor.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Or a distance of about 6,000 miles across. It is absolutely the only harbor in a quarter of the globe that commands the trade routes, and the routes that fleets would take in crossing from the Eastern to the Western Hemisphere. It is the most important strategic point under the American flag, bar none, except the Hawaiian Islands, but now I gather from the gentleman's committee that they do not expect to develop the Virgin Islands.

Mr. PADGETT. As to whether there would be any development at all has not been considered. The question that was asked me the other day and which I answered was as to the relative value or adaptability of the harbor at St. Thomas for a naval base, compared with others. I stated then that at Samana Bay there was a place many, many, many times more valuable and much better adapted than St. Thomas.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But I am unofficially advised that the harbor at St. Thomas is incapable of a development so as to make a proper place for our present Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. In my judgment it is not a proper place to establish a naval base.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now, may I make one further inquiry of the gentleman? The sum named here is $200,000. What on earth are we going to spend $200,000 on in the government of the island of St. Thomas?

Mr. PADGETT. The revenues of the island of St. Thomas, the Virgin Islands, especially St. Thomas, were derived from its shipping. There are no industries there to amount to anything except a little mercantile——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. There is quite a lot of ship repairing.

Mr. PADGETT. There was, but this war has absolutely paralyzed it, and the people there are in a deplorable condition, so far as resources, revenues, and occupations are concerned, and there is a shortage of revenues as compared with absolutely essential necessary expenditures.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. They had a land tax. Is not the land producing as much now as it did then to enable it to pay this tax?

Mr. PADGETT. The land tax there is nominal. The land starts at the water's edge, is bounded by the heavens on one side and the water on the other.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. PADGETT. And goes up straight from the water. The farming interest amounts to nothing.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I assume estimates were submitted showing $200,000 was needed to administer the government of that island?

Mr. PADGETT. The estimates submitted were very much more, but the Secretary has only reported $200,000. Admiral Oliver—and when I was down there I spent several hours with him in a personal conversation, going over the whole state of the island—was very earnest in recommending even much more than this.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Did he want to build docks or build roads?

Mr. PADGETT. No; it was for health and hospitals and internal government and administration of affairs. It does not contemplate making anything of that kind whatever.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, may I say just one word here, that one of the sources of revenue of that island was a lottery, which, of course, has now ceased to exist, in addition to the returns received from shipping. Now, it happened that down there the educational system was entirely maintained by religious institutions. That has now practically ceased, and some of this money is going to go into the schools.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Just one final word, and I do not care to take up too much time, but I do consider this very important. I am sure evidence was submitted to the committee to which I belong when we purchased this island for the sum of $25,000,000, which some of us thought was extortionate, that there would be no considerable charge on the Treasury of the United States in maintaining it unless we wanted to develop a naval base. Now, here is an estimate for the first year of $200,000.

Mr. PADGETT. But last year there was an appropriation of $100,000, and this year it is $200,000, and last year it was just for a part of the year and before they had opportunity to have any investigations or estimates.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now, the fact is that we have on our hands, which cost $25,000,000, some land which will not grow enough to justify taxation, bounded by the sea beneath and the heavens above, land where the sanitation is such that we will have to spend money to improve the health, land that is not good for a naval base, and that is going to cost $200,000 a year to administer.

Mr. PADGETT. This is not permanent, but in the disturbed conditions, as was stated a while ago, and the breaking up of the shipping and the dispensing with the lottery there from which they received revenues, there is that shortage of revenues that it is necessary for us in those disturbed conditions to supplement it. When conditions become normal, when shipping is resumed, I think that the islands will become then self-sustaining; but in the present disturbed conditions, with their principal industry gone and with the source of revenue from the lottery gone, which was about $175,000 a year, if I remember, why, they are in bad shape.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what the great value of these islands is to the United States if they are practically worthless from an agricultural standpoint and are not good for anything for a naval base? I am sure the people of the United States believed when those islands were purchased that the United States had made a splendid investment. We paid $25,000,000 for them, did we not?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. And with the assurance they were going to be a great safeguard to the United States in the Caribbean Sea.

Mr. FARR. I suggest Germany at any time will take them off our hands.

Mr. BRITTEN. Not now.

Mr. FARR. At any time this Government desires to give possession to Germany she will be very happy to get possession of them, with some of the other land down there——

Mr. BUTLER. Germany will need to have 1,200 ships, then.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not think any country will ever take them off our hands. The Monroe doctrine will have to be abandoned before any other country could get them of this Government. It is necessary to have those islands, and I presume they were negotiated through the State Department. The Navy Department had nothing to do with the acquisition of those islands, but they were turned over to that department for administration.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask if it is not a fact that these little islands that we were talking about cost pretty nearly as much as all the other land that the United States has purchased of any country from its organization down until now?

Mr. PADGETT. I think we paid something like seven and a half millions for Alaska, and then in the Paris treaty after the Spanish-American War I think we paid $20,000,000 for the Philippines. How much we have paid since then has been a source of unlimited disputation and debate.

Mr. SLOAN. But the Louisiana Purchase, our great purchase, was only three-fifths of what these little islands that might disappear in the night cost us.

Mr. PADGETT. That was a great acquisition.

Mr. SLOAN. Do they keep a force down there to prevent anybody from abstracting those islands in the course of the night time?

Mr. PADGETT. They are firmly rooted in the bottom of the ocean.

Mr. SLOAN. But suppose those corals that are at work under it should strike, for instance. Would not the foundations be removed from those islands?

Mr. PADGETT. The corals are so constituted that they never remove anything. They always add to the formation.

Mr. SLOAN. They do not belong to a union?

Mr. PADGETT. They are always adding to the formation.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state under what act the $100,000 appropriation was carried last year?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. It was carried in the act of March 3, 1917, Public Act No. 389.

Mr. WALSH. That was not the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. PADGETT. No. I think it was a bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations. It was after the naval appropriation bill had passed, as I remember.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order in view of the fact that the gentleman has answered the question I had in mind in replying to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. The disclosures that have come to light in this colloquy here are, to say the least, wonderfully surprising to me and disappointing. Those islands we have been looking upon for more than 70 years as of great value to us strategically, and now it seems that after we have purchased them at a good price the information comes to us, probably through investigation, that the purpose for which we purchased them can not be carried out.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know whether it was the purpose for which we purchased them. I am rather inclined to think that the underlying moving spirit that prompted the purchase was to keep somebody else from getting them.

Mr. FESS. That was not the purpose originally, when Mr. Seward wanted to buy them.

Mr. PADGETT. At that time, the gentleman will bear in mind, the ships of the Navy were sail ships of a few hundred tons, and the little harbor at St. Thomas would accommodate those small sail ships, but would not now accommodate ships of 40,000 tons displacement or one of 32,000 tons, 850 feet long.

Mr. FESS. Then we are to understand that the Danish West Indies Islands are not available for a naval base?

Mr. PADGETT. I can only speak from my own personal knowledge from having been there. I do not think under any circumstances that it would be desirable to establish a base there when it is possible to get one near there that is far superior.

Mr. FESS. Will it not be construed by the American people that we purchased "a pig in a poke"; that we paid a big price for a group of islands and afterwards investigated and found that they could not be utilized? Will not that be the general opinion of the public?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know about that. The gentleman can form his own ideas about that.

Mr. FESS. That is my own conviction about the matter.

Mr. PADGETT. I will say to the gentleman that my own idea has been, even before I went there, that the purpose in getting them was that it would be cheaper to buy them and own them ourselves than to have a controversy over somebody else's getting them.

Mr. FESS. That may have been the purpose.

Mr. PADGETT. It may have been the underlying purpose. That was not discussed in the open.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I think it is fair to say that for a number of years before we acquired those islands Denmark had practically abandoned them; that is, she was spending almost nothing on them. As I remember, we found that the inhabitants of the island of St. John had practically gone back to the bush. Religion, education, sanitation, and practically everything had been thrown aside.

Mr. PADGETT. There are only a few hundred people on the island.

Mr. FESS. I will say to my colleague from New York that for years and years those islands had been looked upon from the standpoint of the State Department as being very valuable, and that we ought to purchase them. Big prices were offered for them, and when the matter came up last year the question arose as to why we should pay such an exorbitant price for what they had originally been offered for, and I gathered the idea that it was a very strategic advantage to us as a naval power.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman's statement just now would indicate that the object in view was a diplomatic object. The State Department has repeatedly called attention to the value of those islands, not the military authorities but the State Department. From the diplomatic standpoint the islands were considered to be valuable. Our purchase of them has prevented others from coming in there, and, to say the least, from causing us a lot of embarrassment.

Mr. FESS. If other nations believed it would be of strategic value to be there, would we not be in the same position?

Mr. BRITTEN. No. We have many harbors on this side, and other nations might not have any on this side, and a small harbor in the Virgin Islands might be valuable to another nation.

Mr. FESS. Would it be a good policy for us to go into the West Indies and buy everything we can get?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; at any time, rather than let somebody else have them for hostile use against us.

Mr. HICKS. From the agricultural standpoint the value of those islands is almost nil. There are just a few valleys where sugar can be grown.

Mr. FESS. I had thought that they were strategically valuable.

Mr. HICKS. I thought so, too, but when I was there last summer I thought we had gotten something of very little value.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, may I have a minute more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. I would like to ask the chairman whether the use of the phrase "West Indian Islands" is not misleading, inasmuch as there are many islands in the West Indies other than the Danish West Indies or the Virgin Islands. Why not make it read, "Temporary government for the Danish West Indies Islands" or "Temporary government for the Virgin Islands"?

Mr. PADGETT. It should be "Temporary government for the Virgin Islands." That came down from the department in that form, and we simply followed the estimates.

Mr. FESS. That is in the caption. I do not know that it is material.

Mr. PADGETT. It follows the provision that was in the other appropriation bill.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that when this purchase was up for consideration it developed that at a prior date these islands had been offered to us at $5,000,000.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. And that we had not purchased them. At that time I submitted a rather strict inquiry to find out the reason for the addition of the $20,000,000. A few years before they had been offered for $5,000,000 and not purchased, and now they were asking $20,000,000 additional, which seemed to be quite a boom in real estate. I could not understand why at that particular time $20,000,000 were added to the price of these islands, over what had been estimated before. I am interested now to find that we are just discovering that we paid a very large price for something that can be of very little if any value to us, either during the war or at any other time.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not possible that we purchased a lemon grove.

Mr. SLOAN. Perhaps a squeezed lemon.

Mr. FESS. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs if the organization of any more permanent form of civil government for these islands is in contemplation?

Mr. PADGETT. I understand that as soon as they get them in a stabilized condition under the naval administration the question of a permanent government will be taken up; but in the disturbed conditions now existing and the necessity of keeping outposts and a lookout down there, and it being the only thing we have in that group of islands, the government is to remain under the Navy Department. How long it will so remain I really can not say.

Mr. FESS. I agree that it is a matter for the Executive and not the Congress, and that whether the President wants to govern through the War Department or the Navy Department is a matter that should be left for the time being entirely to his option. I agree also that the status is not such now that we could organize a civil government there. I think that would be unwise at this stage.

Mr. PADGETT. The organization act says that the government of these islands shall be vested in a governor and in such person or persons as the President may appoint, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President shall direct, until Congress shall provide for the government of said islands.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Investigation of fuel oil: For an investigation of fuel oil and gasoline adapted to naval requirements, including the question of supply and storage and the availability, economically and otherwise, of such supply as may be afforded by the naval reserves on the public domain, and for such other expenses or transportation and hire of vehicles in connection with naval petroleum reserves as the Secretary of the Navy may deem appropriate; for the purchase of necessary instruments and appliances; for the extension of the naval fuel-oil testing plant at the navy yard, Philadelphia, Pa.; and the temporary employment of civilian experts and assistants, $60,000.

Mr. ELSTON. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question about this expenditure. Can he tell me a little about the scope of this appropriation of $60,000?

Mr. PADGETT. This appropriation has been carried for the last three or four years. It is for the purpose of experimenting both with the manufacture and the development of fuel oil, and also for the preservation of the oil that we have upon our public domain.

Mr. ELSTON. This matter has come up incidentally in the Committee on Public Lands, and the question was asked of the representative of the Navy Department as to why actual exploratory drilling was not made by the Navy Department on naval reserves where there are no private holdings, as in naval reserve No. 1, in California, and No. 3, I believe, in Wyoming. The oil content of the domes covered by these naval reserves is not definitely known.

I think it advisable, and I believe the representative of the department agreed, that the Navy should make exploratory drillings to find out the possible oil content, in order to determine the disputed necessity for holding on to naval reserve No.

2, which is covered largely by private claims, and which is involved in litigation.

Further than that, it was brought out in the committee hearings that the oil shales of Utah and Colorado had come under investigation as a possible fuel reserve. The statement was made by the representative of the Navy Department that these oil shales were not seriously considered by the department as a possible reserve, although the oil content in them was acknowledged, and experiments in other countries showed the practicability of the extraction of fuel oil from shales of this character. Is it intended under this appropriation that these shales, for instance, shall be experimented upon with the idea of determining whether there is a great reserve there of fuel oil for the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. I understand it is the purpose of the department to develop, as far as it can, the whole product to ascertain where there is oil, and the character of it, and to experiment in the manufacture and development of it in its largest sense. But, as I stated, I think this is the third appropriation that we have had. The first one, I think, was for about $30,000, and last year $50,000; but war conditions arose and changed the situation of things, so that the Navy Department has not been able to take it up as a new enterprise and develop it as the Secretary of the Navy desires.

Mr. ELSTON. How would the gentleman regard an amendment to increase this appropriation to an amount large enough to permit exploratory drilling in these two naval reserves, which are untouched by private claims?

Mr. PADGETT. I would not want to do that now, because we have so many activities already and so many more urgent demands for money for strictly war necessities that we want to put the money where it is needed and withhold it where it can be withheld.

Mr. ELSTON. I appreciate that, but I believe if the chairman of this committee had been present at the hearings of the Public Lands Committee he would have been impressed with the importance of ascertaining what amount of oil is contained in these naval reserves which are not covered by private claims. Until that is done, we will not know how best to adjust the conflict between the Navy and the private claimants.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SHALLENBERGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Aviation: For aviation, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for procuring, producing, constructing, operating, preserving, storing, and handling aircraft, establishment and maintenance of aircraft stations, including the acquisition of land by purchase, donation, or condemnation; and for experimental work in development of aviation for naval purposes, $188,042,969: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for drafting, clerical, inspection, and messenger service for aircraft stations shall not exceed $300,000.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I want to reserve a point of order on this for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee. Some of this seems to have escaped my attention as a member of the committee. I want to ask about the including of the acquisition of land by purchase, donation, and condemnation. Is this any specific land?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Were any limits placed on the amount of money to be expended for that purpose?

Mr. PADGETT. When Capt. Irwin was before the committee he called attention to the fact that at Miami, Fla., they have built a station on which a very large amount of money has been expended under lease. This was to authorize the acquisition of that land at Miami, on the east coast of Florida, the point that was selected by the board that went up and down the Atlantic and Gulf coasts as the most desirable and best-fitted place on the south Atlantic. He stated that this was needed, not only for war purposes but also for aviation purposes after the war, and also for the purchase of a site at Port Arthur, Tex., if I remember correctly.

The amount that was intended for the purchase of the Army was either $50,000 or $52,000. The amount at Port Arthur I do not recall at this moment, but it was stated that these places were needed on the south Atlantic and Gulf coasts, and that large expenditures were being made and would still be made on this leased land, and with the purchases by these small amounts we would own the large improvements placed upon them.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Then it is only contemplated to purchase the land at two places?

Mr. PADGETT. That is all I recall at this time.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee how much money we have appropriated for aviation in the Navy up to and including this which is recommended in the bill?

Mr. PADGETT. Last year in the appropriation bill for the fiscal year of 1918, in the regular naval bill we appropriated $5,133,000. Under the deficiency act of June 15 we appropriated $11,000,000, and under the deficiency act of October 6, 1917, we appropriated $45,000,000. I have not a memorandum of what was carried in previous years. I may add that the larger amount here is needed because of the very rapid enlargement and development of machines, and also for the establishment and operation of bases in Ireland, Scotland, France, and England.

Mr. FOSS. How many aircraft stations have we in this country at the present time?

Mr. PADGETT. I have a memorandum of them here, but they are regarded as confidential, and also we have a number in the places I have mentioned, and their location is regarded as better not for publication.

Mr. FOSS. Do they intend to increase the number of stations?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know of any beyond what they have now. They have got a number at different places. I can give the gentleman an illustration. The largest airplanes we are constructing now cost $30,000 and the two engines cost $6,000 each, making a cost of $42,000 for a machine.

Since that machine was put into operation in the recent past we learn that they are making still larger ones abroad. So what is regarded as the best to-day next week is superseded by something still larger.

Mr. FOSS. In other words, the last word has not been spoken.

Mr. PADGETT. No; it has not.

Mr. FOSS. This subject of aviation is of immediate interest to the House and the people generally throughout the country. We have been hearing about the progress of aviation in the Army, and I think it would be interesting if the gentleman would speak in a general way of the progress made by the Navy. Has it been satisfactory?

Mr. PADGETT. Not altogether. The aviation matter has not been entirely satisfactory, but I do not think it has been the fault of the department or of the administration. For instance, at the beginning of the war private manufacturers held out promises that they could extend their business and deliver a certain number of machines at a given time. When they came right up to the proposition they were unable to do what they had promised. Their promises were too optimistic, but the situation has improved very rapidly. A few days ago I was talking with Admiral Taylor, whom the gentleman knows well, a member of the Aircraft Board representing the naval side, and he stated that the Navy was up to its promises and expectations with training machines, but that they were about 60 days behind on the combat or fighting machines, and that the 60 days was being cut down, and they were making good progress toward getting up to their expectations.

He also stated that the companies and firms that had heretofore made optimistic promises and were unable to perform them are getting better organized, better to understand the work, and that they are delivering much more satisfactorily.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, reverting to the reply of the chairman of the committee to the question of my colleague about the progress of aviation in the Navy, I think this is an opportune time to say something I have in my mind. It is not my intention to criticize anybody in particular in the department of aviation or in the Navy. I think the attention of Secretary Daniels should be called specifically to aviation in the Navy at this time. There appears to be a lack of coordination there some place. Surely no one will say that the head of the Bureau of Construction and Repairs, Admiral Taylor, is not one of the foremost naval constructors in the country. Admiral Earle, at the head of the ordnance, is equally rated among the great ordnance experts and is ably assisted by Commander Kearney. Admiral Palmer, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, is a complete success, as also is Admiral Griffin, Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering. All these various bureaus contribute something to aviation. Aviation is presided over by Capt. Noble Irwin. I am sure that when the chairman of the committee said that aviation was not entirely satisfactory he expressed it very moderately. The subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs, presided over by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], went into the conduct of the war by the Navy very thoroughly, and we were highly pleased with our findings in almost every particular, except in aviation. There is a lack of coordination there somewhere. Members of Congress can not tell them what to do, but I am sure if the Secretary will dig into it he will find that something important is lacking.

Last year some $64,000,000 was provided for aviation. When Capt. Irwin came before the committee he said that amount of money was ample. I really think that the House would be astounded if I told them how many qualified pilots we had in the Navy on January 1 of this year, the number is so ridiculously small. They say we are going to get more machines some time this year. I hope we are. Expansion of aviation in the Navy Department depends very largely on what is done in the Aircraft Board. We are going to use the Liberty motor. The Liberty motor up to the present time has not been turned out in very large numbers. It is said that they will be from now on; but it is always next month or the following month that something is to be done. It makes no difference, however, from my point of view, how successful the Army is in getting out Liberty motors, unless we have coordination of the various bureaus making up aviation in the Navy we are doomed to further disappointment.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Do I understand that the Navy is using the same motor that is being made by the Army?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. And that the Army is manufacturing for the Navy?

Mr. BRITTEN. The Aircraft Board is controlling the manufacture for the Army and the Navy. Of course, the gentleman understands that the Army itself does not do the manufacturing?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. The Navy makes its contracts and the Army makes its contracts.

Mr. BRITTEN. Not for motors.

Mr. PADGETT. They are using the same motor, the Liberty motor. A certain per cent goes to the Army and a certain per cent goes to the Navy.

Mr. DOWELL. Right here may I ask one other question? Is there other difference between the planes used by the Navy and the Army?

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, yes; a great difference.

Mr. PADGETT. The motor is the same, but the mechanical construction of the planes for landing is very different. One is to land on the water and the other on the land.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. If it is along the line of my argument, for I have not yet concluded.

Mr. HUSTED. I find that in the Army aviation they are turning students out of the ground school much faster than they are able to provide them with planes in which to learn to fly. I think that is unfortunate. I know men who have passed through the ground school who are being drilled now as private soldiers in the infantry, and they are losing the benefit of their theoretical training, which they got in the ground school. I would like to know if that same condition exists in the naval aviation.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; there is a shortage of planes.

Mr. PADGETT. Just at this point, before we get away from the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Two or three days ago I was in conversation with Col. Deeds, who is very prominent in the Army manufacture of planes, and he stated this fact, which I think is the keynote fact: He says there is not an aviator abroad who has not machines with which to fly, and that there will not be one abroad that will not have machines when he needs them.

Mr. FARR. They are foreign machines?

Mr. PADGETT. They are foreign machines; yes. They made contracts with France for the delivery of machines over there until they could organize the business here and get them abroad, but they are beginning to ship them abroad. The crucial fact that I want to bring out is that the men we have over there to fly have the machines, and that preparation is made to furnish machines to all that we send over there as they need machines, and we are shipping machines now.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We are shipping the motors there, too, are we not?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And hope to increase the shipment very largely?

Mr. PADGETT. And I will say another thing: Col. Deeds said to me that England had made a request for a given number of motor engines by the 1st day of July. He stated that they not only expected to furnish England with the number that she had asked for but they had their arrangements made to furnish her more than she had asked by the 1st day of July.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me there to ask a question of the chairman of the committee?

Mr. BRITTEN. Certainly.

Mr. DOWELL. Can the chairman of the committee tell us about how long it takes to construct one of these planes when the contractor is in full operation?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know the time that it takes; but just a day or two ago several of us went across the river, near Anacostia, to see the large machine that came up from some point down in Virginia, about a hundred miles, coming in an hour and four minutes. We went over there to see it, and Admiral Taylor pointed out that machine and said that arrangements for the manufacture of those machines as soon as they got their plans developed were such that they would turn out two a day.

Mr. DOWELL. How many manufacturers are making that machine?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know, but there are several of them.

Mr. BRITTEN. That would probably go into the dozens, because of the various parts being manufactured all over the country and assembled in the larger plants.

Mr. DOWELL. What I was trying to get at is what we may expect as to the rapidity of the manufacture of these machines.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will not that depend almost entirely on the manufacture of Liberty motors, if the Army and the Navy use the same motor? It has been said publicly that it is the expectation, beginning on March 1—and by the way that program has fallen down—to turn out 5,000 motors a month. So that the aviation program in the Navy as well as the Army must depend entirely upon the output of motors.

Mr. PADGETT. And the motors have been standardized and they are proceeding with the manufacture of the motors in the standardized condition. Heretofore, as the gentleman knows, the Liberty motor was a composite manufacture of a number of different patents where the patentees agreed that the best part of their idea might be consolidated into this composite machine; and then they started out to test it, and if a weak part was discovered it was improved. Then, in making further experiments, taking advantage of every discovery, that was added in. Now, they have gotten a machine which they believe is a good workable machine and they are proceeding to manufacture those in quantities, not changing their plans by these developments and improvements made from time to time, but they are making them as they have them and if they get a further improvement they will make the improved machine subsequently, but they are making quantities of the machines as they are now developed and standardized.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I had five minutes a moment ago and I have not spoken a word yet.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a short question?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will.

Mr. MAPES. I would like to know if production of the aircraft of the Navy is under the Aircraft Production Board, the same as the Army?

Mr. BRITTEN. Indirectly it is.

Mr. MAPES. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. BRITTEN. Admiral Taylor, chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repairs, is a member of the Aircraft Board, which controls aviation production to a large degree.

Mr. MAPES. Does the board have control of the production of the aircraft of the Navy?

Mr. BRITTEN. It has as to establishing the contracts for the production of motors. The Navy will get its quota out of the general production of approximately 5,000 per month.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. McKENZIE. I desire to ask my colleague in regard to certain language in the section here, which reads like this:

Including the acquisition of land by purchase, donation, or condemnation.

This is for a flying field, and I would like to ask my colleague what has been the policy of the Navy Department in regard to that matter. Has the Secretary of the Navy gone ahead and purchased land wherever he saw fit without coming to the Committee on Naval Affairs and submitting the proposition and asking for an appropriation?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; he has purchased no land.

Mr. McKENZIE. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. BRITTEN. But he has done this, and I was about to come to that particular point. At North Island, San Diego, there are some 1,200 acres of Government land, one of the most wonderful aviation fields in the world.

The Weather Bureau reports indicate that a flier can fly there longer than elsewhere, fly a greater number of hours per day on an average at San Diego than any place in the United States because of the delightful climate, no rain, and plenty of sunshine. Now, here is what has been done with aviation in the Navy: Instead of developing that field for which an appropriation was made more than a year ago and the money in hand for a specific purpose for land owned by the Government, our aviation in the Navy goes to Miami, Fla., and leases for a nominal amount a few acres on which they immediately expended $450,000 in building construction, and now comes to Congress and says, "We have spent $450,000 on a little piece of land, and we ought to buy it now." Another instance: At Key West they acquired by lease a small piece of land from a railroad company and they immediately expended $300,000 or $400,000 on buildings on that land which we did not own, and they now desire appropriation for its purchase. One of the things that caused me to make up my mind that aviation in the Navy is not progressing properly was that San Diego condition. The land owned by the Government, the money appropriated for a specific purpose, to be used only for aviation at that place, and not a single dollar was spent after April 1, 1917. We must now purchase these two pieces of land in Florida because of the character of improvements we have put on them, and naturally the committee must recommend this procedure. We have got a million dollars' worth of buildings on land worth $80,000 or $100,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. If my colleague will permit, my reason for asking this question is due to certain criticisms which have been made over legislation of Congress granting the Signal Corps in the Army power to buy land, and that a great sum of this $640,000,000 appropriated by Congress for the construction of aeroplanes has been expended in buying fields here and there and everywhere, it seems, and putting up buildings on them.

Mr. BRITTEN. Well, that has not been the case in the Navy, but in fact——

Mr. McKENZIE. And I thought perhaps the same abuse was carried in the Navy.

Mr. BRITTEN. Purchases and general conditions are quite satisfactory. The Navy is as clean as a hound's tooth in every direction.

Instead of buying land in the South, as they do for the Army, the Navy will lease a piece of land for a dollar a year, put an enormous amount of buildings on it, and then very naturally suggest that it be purchased.

That process may be all right. Maybe we needed an aviation field at Miami. Maybe the location is good. Maybe we needed one at Key West. The location there may also be good. But in the meantime we should have developed the plant at San Diego, Cal., where the Congress had provided for the development of Government property with an appropriation for an aviation field.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two or three minutes without interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Would it not have been better to have purchased this land before they expended this money on it?

Mr. PADGETT. They had no authority.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. You could have gotten the same authority that you are asking for now.

Mr. PADGETT. Congress was not in session. We had to go ahead and act.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Are you paying an exorbitant price for this property in comparison with its value before the buildings were erected and the improvements made?

Mr. PADGETT. From the hearings that we had on the matter it is shown that it is undeveloped land on the water front, and they say the people were asking about the price we proposed to pay. I think it is more than it would be worth or would sell for, but I do not know what water-front land is worth there.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Does not the gentleman think it is the duty of the committee to ascertain the value of this property before the improvements are put on it?

Mr. PADGETT. We did. They said that those people in that country were asking these prices for the land.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, answering my colleague from Illinois, in the Miami purchase the only evidence that the Aviation Bureau or the officers had about the value of the property, was a letter from the secretary of the chamber of commerce down there, who said that the land was probably worth $45,000 in comparison with adjoining values. But it developed in the meantime that as soon as we acquired this property on a dollar-a-year lease we expended $45,000 for filling in and grading while making the land available for aviation purposes, and now we are probably going to pay $45,000 more for the land. That has not yet been determined.

I am not objecting, understand, to the establishment of these aviation bases on the Atlantic coast. We probably need them.

Mr. PADGETT. What you object to is that we did not develop San Diego?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; that they did not develop San Diego.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. I wanted to understand why you did not make some preparations about buying this property before this money was expended, and now you are paying this exorbitant price after you have made it valuable.

Mr. BRITTEN. Ordinary business practice would suggest an option on the land at least, which they have not done.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Is any limit placed on this for the protection of the Government?

Mr. BRITTEN. Not specifically. I do not think we will pay more for the land than it was worth when we started to build down there. I am satisfied there is nothing crooked or disagreeable about the transaction. I do complain because Government-owned land on the Pacific coast which Congress desired developed remained untouched and not a dollar was spent on it for a year, notwithstanding the fact that we were at war.

I do not think I am violating any confidence when I say that, after parleys back and forth between this country and England, it is agreed that the one thing that will stifle the submarine more than anything else is the seaplane.

The chairman of the committee stated a few moments ago that we were establishing aviation bases in Ireland and Scotland and England and France. That is true. We are establishing a good many of them, at enormous cost, but these bases are worthless unless we have seaplanes. The seaplane, equipped with machine guns and to drop bombs, is the one thing to destroy submarines rather than destroyers themselves.

On that account I am anxious to see aviation developed in the Navy even further than aviation in the Army, but it never can be under existing conditions in the Navy Department. I do not think the Secretary of the Navy or the Assistant Secretary is to blame. This matter has probably not been called to their attention, but until there is coordination between the various bureaus contributing to aviation in the Navy aviation in the Navy is going to be a failure, as it is to-day.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I will ask the gentleman a brief question.

Mr. BRITTEN. You may.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman one minute.

Mr. JUUL. What part, if any, of the $640,000,000 that we appropriated for airplanes at the special session has been utilized?

Mr. BRITTEN. Probably 95 or 100 per cent of it has been either expended or obligated.

Mr. JUUL. Did the Navy get any share of that?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; none of it. That was for the Army.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the views expressed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] are shared by the other members of the committee of which he is a member, nor do I feel that the criticism he has directed at the aviation branch of the Navy is borne out by the facts. I recall that the gentleman from Illinois had reported to him some facts in relation to the development of the aviation field at Miami, and also at Key West, that led him to conclude that the action of the Navy in developing these fields was unwise, and on the strength of this information, if it had been correct, the gentleman might have been justified in his conclusions, but afterwards our committee found that information was altogether incorrect.

Mr. BRITTEN. Only as applying to the Key West purchase, and not to the Miami purchase.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The same is true of his criticism of the activities of the Navy at San Diego. North Island was owned jointly by the Army and the Navy. There had been no division of the land between the Army and the Navy, but it was understood that the Navy would take the north half of the Island and the Army would take the south half of the island and develop it. The Army unfortunately was occupying the portion of the island that the Navy was to have, and was using it for aviation purposes. They had buildings there, and men stationed there, and the Navy was unable to get possession of its part of the island without interfering with Army aviation training at its then principal field.

Not until about three or four weeks ago did the Army begin to vacate the part of the island that was to be apportioned to the Navy. They have not yet vacated all of it, though very strenuous efforts have been made by Capt. Irwin to have them vacate at once, because the Navy is anxious to develop its station there. So I want the Members of the House to know that the part of the island which the Navy will develop as an aviation field has been for some years in the possession of the Army, and used for Army aviation. The money is already appropriated for the development of the San Diego field, and the plans are drawn for much of that development, and I have assurances that just as soon as the Army vacates work will begin immediately on that field. The Navy appreciates the importance of developing this field, since there are students on the western coast who are now prepared to take their elementary training there.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. My colleague on the committee, who is always very fair and courteous, said a moment ago that plans had been prepared. Will he tell the House just when the plans for the improvement of North Island were approved by the Navy Department, or if they have been approved up to this present time?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not think they have been finally approved. The plans have been tentatively drawn, and I think comparatively recently. I do not remember the exact date, but I think that came out in the hearings before our committee.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; it did; and I should like to refresh the memory of my colleague. When Capt. Irwin came before the committee he said that plans had been prepared and were about to be approved. On a question from me as to when they had been prepared and presented to the Navy Department he said "last Saturday," this being Monday or Tuesday. I have since learned that the plans were not approved and are not approved to-day, notwithstanding the fact that we have been at war for a year, and that a year ago Congress appropriated several hundred thousand dollars for the development of that particular field, and all they have got to do is to draw plans and have them approved and go ahead with the construction, but they have not done that even to this day, notwithstanding these facts.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yielded to the gentleman only for a question.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MAYS). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. I ask that my colleague have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Alabama have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Is it not true that the revised estimates show that it will require a much larger sum of money than was originally appropriated for this San Diego field?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Very much larger.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And that that is one reason why the plans have not been furnished?

Mr. BRITTEN. Is that any reason why they should not do anything at all? They have got half the amount. Why should they not go ahead with some of the work?

Mr. PADGETT. I will ask the gentleman if it was not further shown that the war being on the Atlantic side and not on the Pacific side, these Atlantic developments were the urgent and pressing needs, instead of those on the Pacific coast?

Mr. BRITTEN. Are we taking no boys from the Pacific coast because the war is on the Atlantic side?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, that is not the case at all, but there had to be development over here before we could train to be prepared for the emergency.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not want to criticize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] because he is sincere in the views he states. I think it is but fair to say, however, that if the members of the committee will read the hearings of Capt. Irwin they will find that like the other members of the committee, excepting the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. BRITTEN. Those hearings are not printed, are they?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; the last hearings are printed, and I have them here. I repeat, all members of the committee excepting the gentleman from Illinois were fully satisfied that the grounds of criticism now directed at the aviation branch of the Navy by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] are not well founded, especially in so far as it relates to the San Diego station.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for just a question there?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is the gentleman himself satisfied with the progress that aviation has made in the Navy during the past year, since we have been at war?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No; I do not think anyone is satisfied with the progress that aviation has made, either in the Navy or in the Army; but I think the officers directing the aviation department of the Navy are capable and industrious and have put forth every possible effort to hurry up construction. They simply could not accomplish the impossible, and their disappointment is as keen as ours.

The Navy has very recently built, near Philadelphia, a factory for the construction of airplanes. They have already turned out more than three, and the production will increase from this time on. That factory was built in an incredibly short time. It has been in operation only a comparatively short time, and they are now largely expanding this plant. The new part of the plant is to be an assembling plant. Contracts have been let in different parts of the country for the different parts of planes, and they will be assembled and put together rapidly at this plant. The naval officers recognize that airplane construction is about 60 days behind on the estimates made last August as to what could be accomplished.

Mr. PADGETT. Less than 60 days. They feel that will be overcome largely as soon as they can have this factory or place for the assembling of completed airplanes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] desire to ask me a question?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman has already answered the question I was going to ask, which was if that was to be an assembling plant. The gentleman has so stated.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. The part that is completed is a building plant, but the additions will be an assembling plant.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. What in general is it proposed to use in these planes that are being assembled?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. My understanding is that the Liberty motor will be used.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman place the responsibility for the 60 or 90 days' delay in the Navy? I am informed from reliable sources that that is practically the delay in the Army.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think that is correct.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That is, the delay is about three months?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Sixty days, I think, in the Navy.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. In other words, the Army hopes in three months from now to be as well advanced as it ought to be now.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Admiral Taylor, who has been referred to here in such complimentary terms, and who fully deserves what has been said, gave to the subcommittee a very clear and full statement of the cause of the delay. Unquestionably private companies have fallen far behind what they estimated to the department they could do, and most of this delay is due to the private companies failing to carry out what they at one time believed they would be able to accomplish.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Of course when the assembled plane is utilized that is the way to get the greatest maximum of output; but if the various plants scattered throughout the country, of which you ask certain things to be produced, if any one falls down, your whole plant is practically paralyzed, or at least its output is stopped.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. From information I have the aviation department of the Navy has foreseen the possibility of that and has not confined the production of parts to any one particular factory or factories. They feel now that they will have very good returns from the contracts let.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I profoundly hope that that is true, but we have been expressing that same sentiment off and on, mostly off but sometimes on, for a year. Has the gentleman anything more to justify his hope than he had some months ago?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I can only say that all the stations are now provided with training planes, and they are fairly well equipped with service planes for advanced training. At all of our completed foreign stations we have a sufficient number of pilots, mechanics, and other trained officers to carry on the program at present. They likewise are provided with a sufficient number of planes. All of these have been obtained from France. We are now prepared to send some finished planes from here to our forces abroad, and these shipments will now rapidly increase, so the department informs me.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman does not mean by service planes battle planes?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; they are now prepared to ship at least 20 service planes, and shipments will steadily increase, so Capt. Morrill has informed me.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman state whether the Navy expects to produce in the near future any battle planes?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. We have not produced one yet.

Mr. PADGETT. Admiral Taylor told me a few days ago that at the present time they were up with the program, and expected, with reference to the training planes and with the battle planes or fighting planes, they were about 60 days behind, but were cutting that down, and now the private concerns were beginning to make deliveries.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I ask the gentleman a question in all sincerity, and he can answer it or not, as he likes? Why was it not possible to take a perfectly successful English airplane and manufacture it in this country?

Mr. FARR. I think I can answer that question, if the gentleman from Alabama will permit me.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. FARR. It was because of the fact that they could not expedite the work on the particular machine. One thing is very comforting—we can build three or four Liberty motors to one Rolls-Royce machine.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The Navy had closed a contract for building Rolls-Royce motors, but afterwards ascertained that the output would be so small that the contract was canceled. Under the contract as tentatively agreed on no deliveries were promised for nine months.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But that does not answer my question.

Mr. HICKS. Yesterday I visited a plant in my district where they are manufacturing a large number of nonflying training machines. They are used entirely for training on the ground. It used to be an old picture-frame molding factory. They are turning out a vast number of these machines every week. It is very pleasing and interesting to see all these machines being turned out.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the Navy Department has decided upon a type of combat plane and upon the motor to be used in that combat plane?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; but the department recognizes that developments in aircraft are constantly occurring, and it is their purpose to keep up with the most advanced ideas.

Mr. HUSTED. The combat plane has been decided on? If proper, I would like to inquire what motor they have proposed to use in it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The Liberty motor; but experiments are now being made with other motors. If anything better than the Liberty motor is found, the Navy will not hesitate to make use of the same, is the information given me by the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman state what estimate is placed on the efficiency of the planes we are going to make as compared with the best planes being used in the war?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The information we have from men like Admiral Taylor is that there is no motor superior to the one we are manufacturing. I will say that France and England have approved it, and orders from both France and England for these motors have been received and some shipments have been made.

Mr. HUSTED. I am rather surprised at the gentleman's statement that we intended to use the Liberty motor in the combat plane.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I was speaking of the large Navy planes.

Mr. HUSTED. I understand they do not intend to use it in the combat planes in the Army aviation.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not know about that.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The chairman stated that we have not produced any combat planes, and yet I understood him to say that the naval authorities claim that they are only 60 days behind their program. It must have been, then, that they did not expect to produce any combat planes up to this time. Is that it?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We have secured planes abroad, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I notice a great many young men on the streets here in aviator's uniform, with the flying badge of the Navy, many more than of the Army. Have we plenty of trained fliers developed now in the Navy?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. My understanding is that we have a good number; not plenty. We are constantly adding to this number.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The gentleman thinks we have plenty of those?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The production of fliers is ahead of service machines, and it is hoped will be kept so. May I just add in that connection that we had something like about 320 officers and men in the Aviation Service when war was declared. We have now more than 17,000.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. How many of those are fliers?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am not prepared to tell the gentleman the number, but do not think it would be proper to write it into the RECORD.

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman wishes, I am willing to show him a tabulation that I have here.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Is there the same general requirement for aviation in the Navy as in the Army? Does a flier have to have a certain amount of skill, and does he receive an increase of pay?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And these men who have the badge are trained aviators?

Mr. PADGETT. There are student aviators and trained aviators in the Navy.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Do they wear this badge when only a student?

Mr. PADGETT. I must confess that I do not know anything about badges.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. My information is that only trained fliers are permitted to wear the badge.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I see so many more of the Navy than I do of the Army that I asked the question.

Mr. PADGETT. I stated before that I could not tell the insignia of an ensign from that of an admiral. I do not know anything about uniforms or insignia.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not recall having noticed the badges, but the department informs me the badge is worn only by the trained flier.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman said anything in regard to the tactical use of these planes? It is perfectly well understood how the battle planes and other planes are used in the Army; but, with the German Navy practically off the seas, what is the intention or expectation in regard to the use of these aeroplanes in this war?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Part of that information perhaps might be considered confidential. However, the larger planes, I will say, are used for hunting and destroying submarines, and they are very effectively used for that purpose.

Mr. TILSON. That is the point that I wished to bring out.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There will be some combat planes of a smaller type used by the Navy, but I would not care to discuss matters in that connection.

Mr. TILSON. It is a fact that it is the intention to use them, and they are being used now to destroy submarines.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will say that it is, and that it is believed there will be no more effective means of disposing of submarines than by aeroplanes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I dislike to do so, but I would like to have five minutes more, as I want to make one connected statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his time for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Now, in connection with the aviation fields at Miami and Key West, referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], these two fields were selected by boards early last year after a thorough inspection, and on their recommendation these fields were taken over and developed. There were no funds available out of any appropriation the Navy Department had for the purchase of these fields or even for their development, and the money used in the development of the fields came from deficiency appropriations.

The field at Miami, I am informed, was thought to be very desirable for aviation purposes. It was strategically located. Some allusion was made by the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that a great deal of the field had to be filled up. I am informed that would have been true of any field selected along the coast, and they simply dredged nearby and filled from this dredging. Dredging was necessary for the use of the water in front of the station, and this dredging was used to fill with.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is not trying to convey to the House the idea that you need deep water for the landing of sea planes?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. They needed to deepen the water at that place, and this dredging would have been necessary at any point along the coast. The large planes, I learn, will require about 6 feet for safe operation.

Mr. BRITTEN. How much water do sea planes draw?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The hearings show that only the necessary dredging was done at Miami.

Mr. BRITTEN. How much did the dredging cost, if the gentleman remembers?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not recall.

Mr. BRITTEN. Was not the amount $45,000, and was not that the original value of the property?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No purchase price has been fixed on the property. Capt. Irwin stated that he felt the present owner might demand more than the Government should pay, and in that event condemnation proceedings would be had to obtain a reasonable price. He gave us information as to what the president of the chamber of commerce and other business men of Miami had estimated to be the value of the property. And I feel sure that Members of the House need have no uneasiness that the Navy will pay more than a reasonable price for the land, unless a jury requires them to pay more for it. I fully concur in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Illinois that it is unwise to improve property first, without having a contract for its purchase; but yet you understand this was hurried-up work. The Navy had no authority to buy there, and could not wait for an appropriation. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to find out if the Navy Department is able to provide the student fliers with planes upon which to learn to fly as rapidly as they are graduated from the ground school?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman perhaps missed the statement I made just a few minutes ago that I am informed that all of our training stations are now supplied with a sufficient number of training planes.

Mr. HUSTED. To take care of the graduates from the ground school?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I know that condition does not exist in the Army.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And these stations are fairly well equipped with service planes for advanced training, where it is proposed to give advanced training.

Mr. SEARS. If the gentleman will permit, I wish to say for the information of the gentleman from Chicago, who seems to be laboring under a misunderstanding, that much of the valuable land around Miami is made from filled-in ground. Mr. Deering, of the Deering Harvester Co., is completing a $4,000,000 residence and outbuildings near the aviation camp on partly filled-in ground. This is done by simply pumping the sand out of the bay until the low places are filled up and all of the land is not only level, but high and dry.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is there any land down there that might be used for an aviation field or some lowland that might be filled in that the Navy Department might have acquired rather than to take this very expensive piece of property, valued, according to the association of commerce, at $45,000, and expend an additional $45,000 on filling it in?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. May I ask for three minutes more?

Mr. BRITTEN. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman may be extended three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRITTEN. I want to ask the gentleman, who knows all about land down there, if, in his estimation, it could not have been possible to acquire other land at a whole lot less money?

Mr. SEARS. I doubt if it would have been possible. The land about Miami is of tropical growth, and——

Mr. BRITTEN. Why was it necessary to have it right at Miami?

Mr. SEARS. It is not; it is some distance away.

Mr. PADGETT. The board went and selected the place because of its location and adaptability to flying uses, and they say it was the best place on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. SEARS. Land that might have been gotten much cheaper would have cost more to fill in.

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, none of the committee complained about the location of the land at Key West. We did feel that the land at San Diego, owned by the Government, for which an appropriation was made by Congress for that specific purpose, should also have been utilized.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Just in that connection I think the gentleman will recall that the information before the committee was very full and showed beyond question that the Navy could develop its part of North Island, for the reason that the Army was occupying and using it for aviation purposes. That unquestionably was the reason why the Navy could not at an earlier time begin the construction of buildings there. There could not have been any better reason assigned. The Army, an important branch of the military service, was actually using and occupying it for aviation purposes. They have not yet vacated it.

Mr. BRITTEN. One more question. What prevented the completion of the plans and specifications for construction work down there by the Navy Department during the year we have been at war?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will say to the gentleman that I do not think an hour's delay will be occasioned by the failure to have plans, but construction will be commenced just as soon as the Army surrenders possession, and insistent demand is being made for the land by the Navy.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is very optimistic. The plans have not been approved up to this day.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The very fact that the Army was in possession and using the property, and the further fact, as stated by the chairman of the committee, that those who were advising the Navy Department said that the stations nearest the war zone should be first developed accounts for the delay in developing the San Diego station.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will.

Mr. SABATH. Can the gentleman inform me as to the number of acres of which this tract consists?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. San Diego—it is a very large tract.

Mr. BRITTEN. Twelve hundred acres.

Mr. SABATH. Twelve hundred acres; that would be about——

Mr. PADGETT. The Government took over the North Island, but this other tract of which we have been speaking is down here at Miami, Fla.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Only a small acreage at Miami—about 26 acres—and if a reasonable price can not be agreed on condemnation proceedings will be had.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman was talking about the land for which we expect to pay $45,000.

Mr. PADGETT. That is about $2,000 an acre.

Mr. BRITTEN. Before we leave the item of aviation I would like to have one minute in order to give a few figures to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRITTEN. I desire to substantiate what I said a few moments ago. On April 1, 1917, when we went into the European war, the Navy had 93 completed seaplanes. They had 133 additional seaplanes under course of construction. On January 1 of this year they had 324 completed planes, all told, many of which were obsolete. In other words, on April 1, 1917, we had 226, either completed or in course of construction, and almost a year later we have 324, an increase of about a hundred in nine months of war period. If that is making real progress, I do not know the true definition of the word. Aviation in the Navy to-day is almost a complete failure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, the progress in aviation has been keenly disappointing to the people of this country. The fact is that there has been too much publicity and promising and too little productivity. A double injury has been done us by those who have made such glowing promises and not fulfilling them. We have not the thousands of aircraft expected, and Germany was stimulated to frantic efforts to produce many thousands of machines; and they have done it.

Now, I have no doubt in my own mind to-day—although I must confess that I view these things with a great deal of concern on account of the many assurances relative to aircraft—that the condition will be improved. But we have not any American machines on the fighting field, and it is no comfort to me to have those in authority tell us that those of our boys who are over there, ready to sacrifice their lives, have machines furnished by our allies when we know that they can not spare these machines; else they would not be asking us to supply them with liberty motors.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARR. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. What encouragement is it to hear that other nations are ready to buy Liberty motors when in six months we produce 65 of those motors out of 20,000 that have been contracted for by the United States Government, and when we produced last month less than we did the month before?

Mr. FARR. That is what I say. The newspapers have been used to encourage the people to believe that we are doing wonderful things to fight in the air, when we are doing very little.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And, furthermore, we were told not to get Rolls-Royce engines because we could produce these faster. In fact, they are producing the Rolls-Royce engine at the rate of 800 a month, while we are producing only 50.

Mr. FARR. I think the Liberty motor, in some respects, will surpass the Rolls-Royce motor. It is a lighter machine. It will have more power, and we can make the Liberty motor, if statements made to me are anywhere near true, three or four times as fast as we could make the Rolls-Royce machine.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARR. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman tell us who is responsible for these glowing reports and false reports as to production?

Mr. FARR. It is a mystery to me. Only a few weeks ago, in the Committee on Naval Affairs, I talked about a special page article that appeared in a Philadelphia newspaper stating that we were going to have thousands of machines by next July. Mr. Daniels, the Secretary of the Navy, was before us at the time and I presented some of the figures mentioned in this article and asked him the question, limiting the number to 5,000 by July 1, if he thought that promise would be fulfilled, and Mr. Daniels stated frankly, "Yes; and I think we will be able to do better than that."

I do not question Mr. Daniels's integrity or truthfulness. I believe he stated what he actually believed. We had Admiral Taylor before us, and there were very encouraging reports as to what this country was going to do in the matter of aircraft. The admiral also was sincere in his statements; but we have been keenly disappointed. The information that I get is that there are too many persons interested in aircraft.

What we want is one big man to take hold of this situation and build the airplanes and send them to Europe and help to win this war.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARR. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I take it from what the gentleman has said that he does not approve, for example, the action of the Secretary of War in calling in the reporters and giving a statement as early as last July as to what this Liberty motor is in its operation, in view of the fact that changes have been made since then, and it still is not used for the combat plane or the very fast flying plane.

Mr. FARR. We are not making any combat planes. I think one type of bombing machine is a most promising one, but difficulties have arisen because of the fact that many parts are needed for the combat machine that are not necessary for practice machines.

Mr. FESS. In other words, it produces a state of public opinion that will revolt later, when the truth comes out?

Mr. FARR. There is a great deal of anxiety throughout the country about our aircraft. But I got much satisfaction from the President's recent address in Baltimore. It is the best punch that the President has put into a speech. He has caught the spirit, the purpose, and the determination of the American people to make a real fight. They know it takes force to meet force, and they want it done.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARR. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I infer from the gentleman's remarks that if we confined the statement of those gentlemen to the recording of history and prevailed upon them to avoid prophecy we would be giving a better service to the American public?

Mr. FARR. My criticism is of the false encouragement given to an anxious people, who are willing to make every sacrifice to win the war. We have made great progress in our preparations. Our Navy is in a highly efficient condition—actual, not imaginary. It has been made such by performance and not promise. The country wants to see less promise and more performance in aircraft. There is no doubt of our ability to do it. Our allies are holding on with desperation waiting for us to add strength to that right arm of brave, splendid, young men over there, of which Secretary Baker speaks, by putting more of the power of the American body in that right arm.

Mr. HUSTED. Does not the gentleman think it was a very serious mistake to devote our entire energies to the experimentation, in trying to develop a new motor, instead of building motors that had been tried out in actual warfare and were known to be right, and experimenting on the side in the attempt to get something better? Now, we have devoted our whole time to experimentation, in the hope of developing a better motor, and we have not got the motor yet; and everybody who knows anything about air motors knows that it takes about two years to perfect one. In the meantime we have no motor to put on our planes.

Mr. FARR. I hope the gentleman's statement is not true. I trust we have succeeded in getting a real motor. I have confidence that we have. I talked with a constructor only three or four days ago relative to this matter, and I believe he knows what he is talking about. He has a knowledge of the business, and he thinks we have done splendidly so far as we have gone, and that the Liberty motor is a success. The same gentleman informed me that Germany has maintained her strength in the air largely through one machine—the Mercedes. She has made no changes in that machine; but by tactical experience and ability has utilized it to great advantage.

Mr. FOCHT. Inasmuch as the gentleman has just stated that he was disappointed with respect to the prediction and forecast made by Secretary Daniels and others in authority, will the gentleman, who is a member of the committee, inform me and other Members of the House who are standing on the outside what he thinks about the aeroplane business and when we are going to get 5,000 or 1,000 machines, or any airplanes, to go to Europe? Will the gentleman state that, if it is not exceeding the bounds of propriety for him to do so?

Mr. FARR. The promise is made that 750 machines will be delivered by the 1st of July.

Mr. FOCHT. I do not want promises, but the gentleman's own idea.

Mr. FARR. I want to say frankly and regretfully that all we have had before the committee and in the newspapers has been much more of promise than of actual results.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FARR. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman is always well informed about naval matters. Does he think aviation in the Navy is a success to-day?

Mr. FARR. No; I do not think so, because of the fact that the undertaking was so tremendous and the promises were too many. A year ago last February, with all the facilities that we had in this country for building aircraft, we could not turn out more than 100 to 125 ordinary practice machines in a month. So what was the sense of talking about 20,000 or 10,000 or 5,000 within a year, and elaborate combat machines at that?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Do I understand the gentleman to say that 750 airplanes are promised by the 1st of July?

Mr. FARR. Seven hundred and fifty Liberty motors are promised. It is promised that they will be ready for England on July 1. That shows that England needs more aircraft, and it is not comforting to us to hear the statement made that our boys over there have English machines, when we are taking those machines away from England, which is putting up the battle to protect the liberties of this country.

Mr. PADGETT. England has asked for 750, and we expect to furnish more than 900.

Mr. FARR. Seven hundred and fifty is what the gentleman told me at Anacostia the other day. I think the chairman of the Naval Committee and every other member of the committee are disappointed in the number of airships turned out. I regret that we have suffered that disappointment, because I think our Navy is in wonderfully good shape. It is vastly the best Navy that we ever had and is making a fine showing across the ocean; and when the real crisis comes, I believe it will show splendid results. [Applause.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that Secretary Daniels made the statement that we would have 5,000 airplanes by the 1st of July.

Mr. FARR. More than 5,000.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. How can that be reconciled with the promise made by the man supposed to know? How can we reconcile that statement with the optimism of the Secretary?

Mr. FARR. The Secretary of the Navy believed it would be done. Frankly, the Secretary of the Navy was deceived, as the rest of us were deceived, and as the country has been deceived.

Mr. FOCHT. Then you are still in doubt as to whether you are going to have five or even one?

Mr. FARR. We saw a splendid bombing craft over at Anacostia the other day, and it made an excellent record in coming up from Newport News. There is no question about that, and I believe the Liberty motor has many excellencies. But it is a question now of turning out the Liberty motor. One fighting craft over in Europe is worth more than a thousand in our imagination in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania think it is a fair assumption to say that England is short of airplanes, simply because she proposes to buy some of our Liberty engines? Is it not possible that England might want some of these engines on account of the fact that they are better perhaps than those she now has, but that nevertheless she is fully equipped with airplanes?

Mr. FARR. England wants aircraft, more aircraft, and more aircraft. France wants aircraft and more aircraft. She wants these fighting aids, and we are not furnishing them. We are not furnishing them for our own boys over there, and we are not providing them in sufficient numbers to develop the thousands of young men in this country who are anxious to do their all for their country.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do not think it is a fair conclusion that England is short of airplanes simply because she is buying a few Liberty engines.

Mr. FARR. It is good evidence that she can use more.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to have it understood which we are considering, the larger sum in this paragraph or the sum stated in the proviso. I think it is very important that that should be made clear before we go along.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KELLEY] knows something about the Liberty motor, and I would like to have him state it.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I only want about a minute, Mr. Chairman, to make a statement relative to my understanding about the Liberty motor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, as gentlemen know, these motors are made largely in our section of the country, in the Middle West. A few days ago I visited the Buick plant, in Flint, where they are making a large number of these engines. The head of the Buick plant is regarded as one of the greatest manufacturers in America. He started in the shops as a boy and has worked up to the presidency of the company, and thoroughly understands mechanics. I asked him about the Liberty motor, and particularly about the newspaper reports to the effect that it is a disappointment. He told me that in his judgment it was the greatest piece of mechanism he had ever known anything about. In its simplicity, durability, weight, and in all essential things it surpassed anything he had ever seen. It weighs only 100 pounds more than the engine in the Buick car. The engine in the Buick car is about 40 horsepower, while the new Liberty engine is a 400 horsepower. I make this statement, based not on my own opinion but upon the information I have received at the Buick plant, which is turning these engines out right along.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was it the opinion of this expert manufacturer of engines from whom you had the information that the Liberty motor would come up to the expectations made for it?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Absolutely; and I think, myself, judging from the statements made by Mr. Chrysler, the gentleman I refer to, that it has proven to be no mistake on the part of the Government to develop this new engine, because it is much simpler in construction, lighter, and more durable than any other engine suitable for aviation purposes. I do not state this of my own knowledge, because I am not a mechanic, but my opinion is based on information supplied as I have stated.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The gentleman tells us about the wonderful information of this particular gentleman about motors, but does he know that after the Liberty motor had been perfected, presumably in Flint, Mich., it was sent to St. Charles, La., and there discovered that the radiator had been constructed for winter service, and, although it worked well up in Michigan, it was impossible to use it in an aeroplane in the summer time, and it had to be sent back to have the radiator changed? I believe there were 106 changes of that sort discovered by the experts.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. It is undoubtedly true that in developing any piece of mechanism of so complicated a nature, difficulties will have to be met that could not have been foreseen.

Mr. HICKS. If the gentleman will allow me, I understood from a man well informed on this matter that the Liberty motor, while it developed a tremendous horsepower on the block, it did not develop that same horsepower at an elevation of 10,000 or 12,000 feet in the air. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Not of my own knowledge, but I am inclined to think that the gentleman's information is not correct.

Mr. PADGETT. A few days ago a number of members of the committee went across to Anacostia to see a big machine that came up 100 miles from down in Virginia. It came up in an hour and 4 minutes, and went up to an elevation of over 10,000 feet. They said they came without missing a stroke, without any impediments or criticism of the engine whatever. It was the double Liberty motor—had two motors in it, and that machine was 92 feet and 8 inches from tip to tip of the wings.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. It strikes me that we can get more than one report just like that. Everyone speaks of the perfection of the thing he has done. It is so perfect that it can not be improved. The truth about the matter is we are finding defects all the time.

Mr. PADGETT. There is nothing perfect. They have been making experiments to develop it, just like they made in the automobile, in electricity, in the talking machine, and in the radio, and all those things, when they were being developed. I stated at the outset that many experiments were made until they got to the present status, but it is now standardized, and they are producing the machines. It is a valuable and efficient and competent machine. If improvements are found in the future, it will not delay the production that is going on until they get the number, and then they can go to making the improved machines to supply future demands.

Mr. FESS. Is it not true that we are talking too much about what we are going to do, rather than doing it and keeping quiet about it?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. I said in the beginning that they were too optimistic; that they made promises they were unable to keep. I have stated that time and again, but these things are being corrected. One of the big concerns that lacks organization has been reorganized, and they are now turning out production.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. What is the parliamentary situation?

Mr. PADGETT. We are running along by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUTLER. Does not the Chairman think that we have now told the Hun all that we know about the motors and that we have not flying machines?

Mr. WALSH. Two or three members of the committee have not spoken yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. I will say to the gentleman that the members of the committee do not bore the House usually with their talk. It has been a disappointment to everybody that the airplanes are not supplied, but I want to say that the Navy Department and the naval officials have done the best they knew how. I believe the fault is that they have had too many cooks at the food.

Mr. PADGETT. I ask that the Clerk continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation: For travel allowance of enlisted men discharged on account of expiration of enlistment; transportation of enlisted men and apprentice seamen and applicants for enlistment at home and abroad, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation to their homes, if residents of the United States, of enlisted men and apprentice seamen discharged on medical survey, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation of sick or insane enlisted men and apprentice seamen to hospitals, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation of enlisted men of the Naval Reserve Force to and from duty, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation of civilian officers and crews of naval auxiliaries; apprehension and delivery of deserters and stragglers, and for railway guides and other expenses incident to transportation; expenses of recruiting for the naval service; rent of rendezvous and expenses of maintaining the same; purchase, rental, maintenance, operation, exchange, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for official use; advertising for and obtaining men and apprentice seamen; actual and necessary expenses in lieu of mileage to officers on duty with traveling recruiting parties, $5,100,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to call the attention of the committee to a situation that has come to my notice through a letter from a widow whose son was enlisted in the Navy and who for some reason or other was discharged as not fit for the service and was turned loose a thousand miles away from home, sick, refused admission to the hospital, without a cent with which to pay his fare home, and left to find his way as best he could in the condition in which he found himself after his dismissal from the service. I called the attention of the department to this condition and inquired whether or not this boy could not find an asylum in one of the naval hospitals for treatment during his illness, and was told that having been discharged from the service as not fit for the service he was not entitled to any consideration by the department. This boy is in a condition from which I fear he will not recover. I think the treatment that he received from the Navy Department was inhuman. His mother is distracted on account of the condition of her boy, and I believe this is the time and the place to call the attention of the Navy Department to the injustice of such treatment of boys who volunteer their services in defense of the flag. I do not know what the rules of the department may be with respect to men who are discharged as unfit, but if there are rules that permit the commanding officers to turn a boy loose because he happens to be so sick that he is unable to perform his duty, then those rules should also include a provision that will compel the officers in charge of the men to care for him as a human being ought to be cared for.

I know of another case where not long since a boy enlisted on the Pacific coast. He was sick during all his voyage down through as far as the Caribbean Sea. He was unable to perform his duties, and the commanding officer of the ship discharged him, turned him out on foreign soil, in a strange land where he could not speak the language, without a dollar in his pocket, and he was compelled as best he could to find his way back to those who could care for him. If we hope to have the confidence of the American people to an extent that will justify the boys of America in fighting for the flag, we have got to compel the men who are in command of the American ships to treat the boys who volunteer their services in the way in which they ought to be treated.

I have been able to receive no satisfaction whatever from any communications that I have sent to the Navy Department in connection with this boy Kennedy, whose mother lives in Chicago in my district. I am not one of the men who believe in calling the attention of the House to these unjust acts, but I believe the future welfare of the Navy justifies me in calling the attention of the House to this matter at this time, and I want to know if the chairman of the committee in charge of this great bill, appropriating $1,500,000,000, or some such sum as that, for the maintenance of the Navy, knows of any such practice in the Navy; and if there is such practice, why?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more, in order that the gentleman may answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that I have never heard, directly or indirectly, of any such practice, and I would like to ask the gentleman if he has investigated that matter. There must be some mistake.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no mistake, because I have the letter of the mother; I have the admission of the admiral in charge of the Bureau of Navigation that the boy was dismissed as unfit for the service, and the fact that he was enlisted in the service must prove that he was qualified for the service when he was enlisted.

Mr. PADGETT. No; it does not prove that.

Mr. MADDEN. Then they had no business enlisting him.

Mr. PADGETT. There may be mistakes made in enlistment, but, as I understand it, under the law a man is not discharged in a foreign country.

Mr. MADDEN. He was discharged here—the one to which I refer.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman mentioned one who was discharged in a foreign country.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and that is true.

Mr. PADGETT. I would like to have the gentleman give me the names of those two men, and I shall investigate those two particular cases. I doubt the accuracy of the gentleman's information. Another thing, the law provides that when they are discharged at home they shall be given transportation back to the place of original enlistment.

Mr. MADDEN. I assert——

Mr. PADGETT. This boy——

Mr. MADDEN. Just one moment. I have the floor, and I object to the gentleman taking up all of my time with a statement to the effect that he doubts the accuracy of my statement.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no, the accuracy of the gentleman's information.

Mr. MADDEN. I have the information based on the letter of the mother of the boy. I have the reply from Admiral Benson in reply to a letter that I wrote him. If there needs to be any further information in connection with it I shall be able to get it. I shall not ask the gentleman from Tennessee to get it for me. If I, as a Member of the House of Representatives, am unable to obtain information I am not going to ask any other Member of the House to intervene in my behalf. I think I am entitled to the information.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman permit me to state that I do not want to be construed as an interloper in any way. I thought the gentleman was asking me for information.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; but the gentleman has not been giving me any. He has been criticizing my statement.

Mr. PADGETT. No; I have not. I was only asking the gentleman to place me in a position where I could be of assistance and service to him.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not need any assistance. If I, as a Member of Congress, have not as much influence as any other Member of Congress, then I have no right here, and if my request for information does not receive the same consideration as the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT], then the people of my district ought to send some one else here in my place. I demand proper consideration for the boys who have enlisted in the Navy, and the one I refer to has not received proper consideration, and every word I say on this floor is absolutely true. I state it on my honor as a Member of this House.

Mr. PADGETT. Let me ask the gentleman, will the gentleman give the names of those two boys?

Mr. MADDEN. I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. PADGETT. I would be glad if the gentleman would do so for the sake of the Navy. I want to see if there is any such practice in the Navy.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, there is.

Mr. PADGETT. I wish the gentleman would put the names of the two boys in the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. I made the statement, and it is not necessary to put the names of the boys in. I have made the statement.

I have charged them with the practice. Now, the question is, is the practice pursued in the Navy Department without respect to who the boys are? I say it is; I know it is. I demand that the practice be changed.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. MADDEN. I will.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I know my friend wants to be fair——

Mr. MADDEN. I am fair, and I am telling the truth as far as I know the facts.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will my friend pardon me? All Members of Congress here have the same interest in their boys——

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. That the distinguished gentleman has in his boys.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Is not it fair to the boys whom I represent that we might have the names of those boys in order that we may protect them against the same injustice being inflicted on them? Will not the gentleman in fairness to us give an opportunity to take such action with the Navy Department that we may protect our boys who are in the Navy?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think the gentleman's statement has anything whatever to do with the merits of the case.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Oh!

Mr. MADDEN. You can protect those you are interested in; I am going to protect those I am interested in. I am not going to ask anybody's assistance to do it. I am going to demand it as a right, and I shall insist upon that right upon the floor of this House in defense of innocent boys from my territory who offer their lives in the service of their country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Outfits on first enlistment: Outfits for all enlisted men and apprentice seamen of the Navy on first enlistment, at not to exceed $100 each; for the clothing gratuity of officers and men of the Naval Reserve Force, not to exceed $150 each for officers and $60 each for men; for civilian clothing not to exceed $15 per man to men given discharges for bad conduct, undesirability, or inaptitude; in all, $9,975,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 8, line 17, strike out the word "men" and insert in lieu thereof the words "every member."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 18, strike out the words "and $60 each for men."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee——

Mr. PADGETT. This is simply because there is a provision for that on a subsequent page.

Mr. BUTLER. All right.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Chairman, I have a profound respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], but unlike him I do not feel I have as much influence as any man in this House. If any man from my district at any period of time has a gross injustice visited upon him by any department of the Government, I would say to my colleagues here that if I am not able to get him righted I will thank each and all of them if they will lend me their assistance in trying to see that simple justice is done him. My purpose here is not to glorify myself, but to serve my people, and if by chance I have to appeal to a department to relieve the distress of one of my constituents I shall welcome any assistance that may be offered me. I am exceedingly sorry to hear the strictures of the distinguished gentleman upon anyone in our Navy, especially upon that gallant admiral who with singular ability has taken the Stars and Stripes in every water of the globe and has done so much to make a Navy of which the Nation may justly be proud at this time. No navy in the world has done so much, I am informed, to relieve the condition that confronts us on the waters from the submarine attacks, and nobody is more responsible for the present efficiency of the Navy than the admiral whom this gentleman has criticized. I know Admiral Benson personally——

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I have known him for a number of years, and am quite sure any Member of this House needs but to go to him once and point out any injustice that is done to any member of the Navy, whether officer or enlisted man, and Admiral Benson, so far as within him and his power lies, will see that that man who has been wronged gets a "square deal."

Speaking from my intimate knowledge and from the reports coming from the press, reports from a press hostile at one time to this department and criticizing it adversely on more than one occasion, I point with pride to the reports which come from all parts of our country now praising the efficiency of the Navy, the efficiency of Admiral Benson, of Admiral McGowan, and all those who hold offices under them, and to the efficiency of the men who are serving in every department. This criticism, it seems to me, comes at a poor time and with bad grace, that a Member of the House, unwilling to give us an opportunity to try to assist him in righting the wrongs of a constituent, prefers to stand here, outraged himself, and hurl an adverse criticism at our Navy Department, of which all America, of which all our allies, at this time are so justly proud. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] can not claim any superior patriotism. I think he has criticized every department of the Government more than any other man in the House, without just reason on many occasions. I have never yet criticized any department. I am here to help. I am proud of the Navy. I am proud of those who conduct the Navy. I am opposed to their treatment of the men. The gentleman's speech has nothing to do with the injustice done to the men in whose behalf I speak; none whatever.

Admiral McGowan happens to be in charge of the purchasing division of the Navy. What place has he in this discussion? The gentleman from South Carolina called him into the discussion without any rhyme or reason. What place has he, or can he have, in the injustice done to a young American who happened by some chance to be unfit for naval service?

What I am anxious to know is whether men who go into the Navy are to be treated as he was, whether he is to be left to the mercy of charity without any attempt on the part of the Government of the United States to nurse him back to health. He was refused admission into the naval hospital, where his parents and his friends requested that he should go. The answer to my inquiry as to why he should not be permitted to go into the hospital was that he was discharged "as unfit for service in the Navy"; not because of his character, not that his character was not good, not that he was not an American, not that he was not clean, not that he was not moral, not that he was not everything that a young man ought to be, but that for some reason his health had failed and he was "unfit for service in the Navy."

I make no complaint about the brilliancy of the management of the Navy. I am proud of it, as every other American is. My complaint is upon a totally different proposition. The speech of the gentleman from South Carolina has no place in this discussion. I am surprised that he should have volunteered to inject himself into a discussion where justice was being sought by a Member of the House for an American who had offered his life to his country and had not been treated as he should have been treated by those in command of the Navy. I do not blame the Secretary of the Navy. He perhaps knows nothing about this conduct. I do not blame Admiral Benson. Perhaps he is bound by ironclad rules that compel him to do an injustice to a human being.

I do not know who may be responsible for the injustice that has been meted out to this young man, but I do know that there should be some remedy applied, and that remedy should be applied at once. I know that the Government of the United States can afford to act in a humane way. It can not afford to turn the young men who go into the Navy or the Army onto the streets and compel them to depend upon charity when they are turned out of the service.

This young man should be cared for, cared for by the Government, and cared for until he is nursed back to health; and I demand that the Government of the United States, or that branch of the Government under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, shall see to it that the commanding officers of ships in the future shall so conduct themselves that no complaint can be made by the mother of any boy.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows whether the admiral had the legal authority to grant this relief?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know whether he had or not. I am not complaining about the action of the admiral. I am complaining about the act of the Government.

Now I yield to my colleague.

Mr. McKENZIE. The question propounded by the gentleman from New York practically covers the question I intended to ask.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. In response to the question of the gentleman from New York, it is my understanding that when a boy is discharged from the Navy for any of the causes mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois, he is not only furnished transportation home but he is furnished with a civilian suit of clothes for that purpose.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to make this statement, that if anything has happened like what the gentleman from Illinois has stated with reference to boys, it has the condemnation of every man that has a humane heart. It would be well to have a statement of the facts, so that they could be investigated, to see whether or not there is any such practice or custom.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent to put the correspondence in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN subsequently said:

Mr. Chairman, I ask to make a statement in connection with the statement I made a short time ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. When I spoke a few minutes ago I said I wanted to put the correspondence into the RECORD that passed between myself and the mother of the young man to whom I referred as being discharged from the Navy for inaptitude. I went to my office to get the correspondence, and I find that all of that correspondence is in the hands of Admiral Benson. I have a copy of the last letter which I sent to the admiral, which reads as follows:

APRIL 9, 1918.

Admiral WILLIAM S. BENSON,
Chief of Naval Operations,
Department of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR ADMIRAL: I have had so much to do lately that I have not had time to take up the letter of Mrs. Elizabeth Kennedy dated March 19, hereto attached, until now. She tells a pitiful story about her boy. It seems to me that the Government ought to do something in a case of this sort. I do not think it is right to take a boy away from home (he must have been qualified or he would not have been accepted) and turn him loose in the condition he seems to be, as if he had no country.

Is there nothing that we can do in such a case? I hope there is.

I know of a case where a young chap enlisted on the Pacific coast. He was put to sea and discharged down in the Caribbean Sea, too sick to stand up, without a dollar in his pocket, in a strange land where he could not speak the language. I wonder if this is the policy of all the commanding officers of the Navy. I do not think it is right.

The boy referred to as having been discharged down in the Caribbean had to work his way back to the Pacific coast the best he knew how, and this boy whose case I take up now seems to have lost his health, and I wouldn't wonder if he has lost his mind.

It looks like an inhuman way to treat men who volunteer their services to their country. There ought not to be any men turned loose without a dollar, in bad health; they at least should be sent home, and if there is anything that the Government can do after they get home to restore them to their former condition it ought to be done.

I shall be glad to hear from you on this subject, especially in respect to the case of Kennedy, and be kind enough to return Mrs. Kennedy's letter and other correspondence, and oblige,

Yours, very truly,

This letter was written to Admiral Benson on the 9th of April and I have not yet had a reply. However, in a former letter from the admiral he stated that the boy had been discharged for inaptitude. My recollection is that he stated that the boy was nervous and could not function in the service, and because of the discharge he was not eligible to admission to the naval hospital.

I make this explanation because I suggested that I would put the correspondence in the RECORD in connection with my statement, but I have it not in my possession, as it is in the possession of Admiral Benson. As soon as I get the correspondence back I will ask permission to insert it all, including the letters from Mrs. Kennedy and Admiral Benson to me, and my own letters in connection with the case. I only rose for the purpose of apologizing for not having the correspondence in the RECORD.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I notice the bill provides for the clothing gratuity of officers and men of the Naval Reserve Force, not to exceed $150 for officers and $60 each for men. It is a fact that the Navy now provides that much?

Mr. PADGETT. The existing law provides that much. That is just under existing law.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Every officer that enters the Navy is allowed $150?

Mr. PADGETT. Not the Regular Navy. That is the Reserve.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. The reason why I ask that is because it has been proposed to the Committee on Military Affairs to allow something like that in the Army. It is not done now.

Mr. PADGETT. The officers of the Navy get no such allowance, but those of the Reserve do. The law provides that in time of war, when they are serving in the war, they shall get an initial allowance of $150 or $160, whichever it is, and $60 for the men. That is on the theory that, coming in on an uncertainty and not knowing how long they may serve and how long they may be giving up their business, they are given that much that does not go to the regular officers.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. What does this cost the Government a year? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I can not state, because the Reserve has been growing very rapidly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the same provision exist as to the officers in the Aviation Service? Is there any provision for paying them for clothes?

Mr. PADGETT. If they are in the Reserve and have rank, they get the same as the others.

Instruments and supplies: Supplies for seamen's quarters; and for the purchase of all other articles of equipage at home and abroad; and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels therewith and manufacture of such articles in the several navy yards; all pilotage and towage of ships of war; canal tolls, wharfage, dock and port charges, and other necessary incidental expenses of a similar nature; services and materials in repairing, correcting, adjusting, and testing compasses on shore and on board ship; nautical and astronomical instruments and repairs to same; libraries for ships of war, professional books, schoolbooks, and papers; maintenance of gunnery and other training classes; compasses, compass fittings, including binnacles, tripods, and other appendages of ship's compasses; logs and other appliances for measuring the ship's way, and leads and other appliances for sounding; photographs, photographic instruments and materials, printing outfit and materials; and for the necessary civilian electricians for gyrocompass testing and inspection, $3,469,800.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that in line 1, page 9, there is a typographical error, the word "navy" being spelled "navay." Without objection, the Clerk will make the proper correction in the spelling of the word.

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have been criticized by some of my constituents on the ground that I am opposed to a large Navy. I desire to call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that in my remarks last year I stated emphatically I was not opposed to a Navy; but, on the contrary, coming from Florida, which is surrounded entirely by water except the northern border, of all the States in the Union we should be in favor of a large Navy. I opposed the naval bill last year because, as I stated, I did not believe it was a preparedness measure or a naval bill. This is not intended in the spirit of criticism of my colleagues who did not agree with me, especially the members of the Naval Committee. I said then, and I say now, I believe there should have been in the bill a time limit in which contracts should be completed. I made that statement because, to my mind, it is not conceivable that any business man would enter into a contract without having a time limit.

I also opposed the bill last year because I believed we should have more fast battle cruisers, submarines, and submarine destroyers. These could be built promptly, and it would take a good many years to build superdreadnaughts. That my position was true in part was proven by the appropriations that we have since made of nearly $1,000,000,000 to construct smaller vessels. Of course, these are not fast battle cruiers, but the fast battle cruisers could have been turned into vessels for the purpose of carrying food and soldiers across the ocean.

I make this brief statement simply in order that my attitude in the future may not be misunderstood.

I also criticized the appropriation for the Naval Academy. I believed then and I believe now that we are spending too much money on each pupil at the Naval Academy, and I make this statement because of my 10 years' experience in educational work; but I shall not at this time fight or oppose this bill, nor shall I criticize it, because I realize that we are in this war and that we must win it regardless of the cost. I do believe, however, some day my colleagues and the members of the committee will investigate the cost of educating boys, both at the Naval Academy and at West Point, and that some reform may be made.

What I say now is not meant in a spirit of eulogy, but in the spirit of justice. A year ago, when it was not so popular as it is now, I stated that the Secretary of the Navy needed no eulogy at my hands, because I believed history would record him as one of the greatest Secretaries of the Navy the United States has ever had. I am glad that my view is now being agreed to by the press, and that he is receiving commendation instead of condemnation all over the country.

I make these few brief remarks, and shall not take up any more time, because I believe we should legislate and not talk, simply that my attitude last year may be thoroughly understood and not misunderstood, and also that anything I may say in the future will be consistent.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That upon the approval of this act all laws heretofore enacted by the Congress relating to the Naval Militia and the National Naval Volunteers be, and the same hereby are, repealed; that all members of the National Naval Volunteers are hereby automatically transferred to the class "the Naval Reserve," of the Naval Reserve Force, for general service, and confirmed in the rank, grade, or rating they now hold in the National Naval Volunteers, without examination, regardless of their being members of a State military force; that all members of the Naval Reserve Force shall be eligible for reenrollment in the rank, grade, or rating held on the termination of their last enrollment; that no enrollments or promotions shall be made in any rank or grade above that of lieutenant commander, except as herein otherwise provided.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order upon the paragraph. This paragraph and several following it——

Mr. PADGETT. All down to the middle of page 17.

Mr. WALSH. These paragraphs involve a reclassification, or the transfer apparently of some existing branches of the service into the Naval Reserve, and I think it is an opportune time for the chairman or some member of the committee to make a statement with reference to the items under discussion just to vary the monotony a little.

Mr. PADGETT. I shall be very glad, indeed, to explain this legislation. It runs down to the middle of page 17. Up to five or six years ago the Naval Militia existed purely as State organizations, without any Federal connection or Federal legislation. About four or five years ago the committee reported a bill to federalize the Naval Militia, and that was done, and it was organized and constituted a good body. There are at this time about 15,000 or 16,000 in the Naval Militia. The gentleman will bear in mind that under the Constitution the militia can not be sent abroad or to other countries, and the question was raised as to whether that applied to the Naval Militia, the general term in the Constitution being militia, and they being State organizations. So in order to avoid that, in the act of August 29, 1916, if I remember the statute, we enacted legislation creating the National Naval Volunteers, providing that in order to be federalized and to get the benefit of the Federal aid and help to the Naval Militia they must also become members of the National Volunteers. So when the President calls them into service as an organization in an emergency or in time of war he calls them not as the militia but as the National Naval Volunteers, they being members of that organization. There are two organizations running parallel. The State militia organization and officers were represented before the committee, and all of that legislation was congenial and sought and heartily approved by them.

We also established in the act of August 29, 1916, the Naval Reserve Force, consisting of six branches, with which the House is familiar, in order to have a force and to conserve the men who had served heretofore in the Navy and had gone out of the naval service, and also to have available the services of men who possessed seafaring experience and qualifications; and also others from civil life who would associate themselves into the Naval Reserve and be available if called into the naval service in case of war or emergency.

Now, that was started in the act of August 29, 1916. When this emergency came on, I may say, to the Congress belongs the credit of having established that organization, which was largely responsible for the salvation of the situation with the naval matters. We have now somewhere from 65,000 to 70,000 men in the Naval Reserve called into the active service and cooperating with the service, distributed around in the various ships and stations with the Regular Naval Establishments.

Now, we found ourselves in this condition: Here is the Naval Reserve that is running along, and right parallel with it is the Naval Militia and the National Naval Volunteers, forming that composite organization with a similar organization, similar work, similar duties, and costing extra expense.

The Naval Militia and the Naval Volunteers took up the question themselves of being incorporated into the Naval Reserve, where they will have to perform the same duties, the same functions, that they are now performing in this parallel and collateral organization of service. The result of it was that we cut out of the bill an appropriation that had been submitted in the estimates of $1,527,617 for administrative and other expenses for the maintenance of this Naval Militia and National Naval Volunteers by incorporating them into the Naval Reserve Force. The effect of this legislation is just to transfer that organization into and incorporate it with the Naval Reserves.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the chairman if it is the wish of these men to go abroad if necessary that they should go? They made that request?

Mr. PADGETT. They could go abroad as Naval Volunteers, but there is no use of three organizations—the Naval Reserves and Naval Volunteers and the Naval Militia—all of them in auxiliary service, all of them working along parallel lines.

The result is it has saved a million and a half dollars of appropriation. It meets their wishes. They were consulted, and this legislation was the result of conference and work of boards representing the Navy, the Naval Volunteers, and the Naval Militia.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Is the legal status of men in the two organizations changed in any way by reason of the transfer to the Naval Reserve Force?

Mr. PADGETT. No; they are transferred with the same rank, the same rating, just incorporated into and become a part of the Naval Reserve. They asked it and are seeking it, and this legislation was worked out by a joint conference of the Navy and the Naval Volunteers.

Mr. WALSH. Will not the effect of it be, however, to eliminate, probably in the near future, the National Naval Volunteers?

Mr. PADGETT. It eliminates them at once when they are transferred.

Mr. WALSH. And also the State Naval Militia?

Mr. PADGETT. No; it does not interfere with the Naval Militia of a State organization, but the Federal Government cares and provides for them the facilities for training and all the help that has been afforded under the name of Naval Volunteers or Naval Militia. It will give them the same help and consideration that it gives them now under the name and organization of Naval Reserves.

Mr. WALSH. When the transfer is made they will be in the national service as Naval Reserves?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And their identity as Naval Militia will be lost, and they will not be transferred as a body but as individuals?

Mr. HUSTED. No; they will be transferred bodily.

Mr. WALSH. They lose their bodily identity.

Mr. PADGETT. Not as a State organization. They can still keep up the State organization as a Naval Militia, but they receive Federal help and recognition as members of the Naval Reserve.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman advise us what this language means, on page 12?—

Members of the Naval Reserve Force who have enrolled for general service and are citizens of the United States are eligible for membership in the Naval Reserve.

Mr. PADGETT. The act of August 29, 1916, created the Naval Reserve Force. Now, the Naval Reserve Force consisted of six subdivisions. The first is the Fleet Naval Reserve. I will read from the act:

There is hereby established under the Department of the Navy a Naval Reserve Force to consist of six classes designated as follows and as hereinafter designated: First, the Fleet Naval Reserve; second, Naval Reserve; third, Naval Auxiliary Reserve; fourth, Naval Coast Defense Reserve; fifth, Volunteer Naval Reserve; sixth, Naval Reserve Flying Corps.

Now you come to the definitions. When you come to the Naval Reserve, it is "All former officers of the United States naval service, including midshipmen, who have left that service under honorable conditions, and those citizens of the United States who have been, or may be entitled to be, honorably discharged from the naval service after not less than one 4-year term of enlistment, or after a term of enlistment during minority, and who shall have enrolled in the Naval Reserve Force, shall be eligible for membership in the Fleet Naval Reserve.

When you come to the Naval Reserve, you will see that the law provides that members of the Naval Reserve force who have been or may be engaged in the seagoing profession and who have been enrolled for general service shall be eligible for membership in the Naval Reserve. That is the second clause. There is a little modification the gentleman will notice in this. All of the men who are in the Naval Militia have not been seafaring men, as, for instance, a city like Chicago or Philadelphia or many inland places upon the Lakes or from other places. They have had this Naval Militia, but they have not been strictly seagoing men, so that to incorporate them into the Naval Reserve the language is changed as to the eligibility of membership in the Naval Reserve by the language which the gentleman quoted, that men who are citizens of the United States, and so forth, and they must have citizenship. Then they must be qualified to become members of the Naval Reserve, but it eliminates that seafaring occupation as a prerequisite to membership.

Mr. WALSH. But it still requires a man to establish his qualification for the performance of duty aboard combatant ships.

Mr. PADGETT. Those are qualifications as to his moral character, as to his physical condition and fitness, and things of that kind to perform the duties.

Mr. WALSH. And past experience would neither militate against him nor work in his favor?

Mr. PADGETT. No. It is put in there for the very purpose of getting rid of the seafaring experience that was required, in order to enable these men to get into the service.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask one or two specific questions. I am a little confused yet as to this organization. The Naval Militia is not totally destroyed, then, by the creation of the Naval Volunteers?

Mr. PADGETT. Not as a State organization.

Mr. FESS. And that is still retained?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; it would be still in the same fix as though Congress had simply repealed the law that was passed about five years ago federalizing the State militia. The State Naval Militia existed as State organizations for years before the Federal Government attempted to legislate or to have anything to do with them, and then we passed an act, I think about five years ago, to federalize them and organize them, bring them under the Federal help.

Mr. FESS. And the Naval Volunteers is made up of more than the Naval Militia?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. FESS. The Naval Militia is federalized to make the Naval Volunteers?

Mr. PADGETT. No. We had the Naval Militia federalized for two or three years before we passed the National Naval Volunteers act, but, as I stated a moment ago, the question arose as to whether the Naval Militia could be used except in our own territorial waters.

Mr. FESS. I understand that. I am trying to differentiate between the Naval Militia and the Naval Volunteers.

Mr. PADGETT. The whole thing is this: The membership is identical. The Naval Militia, in order to get the benefit of Federal legislation, must become members of the Naval Volunteers. When they become members of the Naval Volunteers they perform the same service as they would in the Naval Militia, but when the President calls them into the service he does not call the Naval Militia into the service, he calls the Naval Volunteers into the service, and they are called in as that organization, but the individuals that compose the two are the same.

Mr. FESS. If I should be asked what is the fighting ability and numbers of the Navy and undertook to designate, first, the Naval Militia, then by the Naval Volunteers, then by the Naval Reserves, what would be the fact? Such a question is frequently asked.

Mr. PADGETT. The Naval Militia and the Naval Volunteers are identical. The same persons that constitute one constitute the other. You would say, just as we do in the Navy, that we have so many enlisted men in the Navy, we have so many apprentice seamen in the Navy, we have so many enlisted in the Flying Corps of the Navy, we have so many in the Medical Corps of the Navy, we have so many in the Dental Corps of the Navy, and then you would say that we have so many in the Naval Reserve. We have now in the Naval Reserve between 65,000 and 70,000.

Mr. FESS. And in active service, how many? How many outside of the reserve? What is your naval equipment now in personnel?

Mr. PADGETT. There are about 304,000 men.

Mr. FESS. Including the reserve?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. That is what I am trying to get.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Take the paragraph on page 10. I think that will illustrate what runs through several other paragraphs. It provides:

That all laws heretofore enacted by Congress relating to the Medical Reserve Corps and Dental Reserve Corps be, and the same hereby are, repealed: Provided, That members of the Medical Reserve Corps and Dental Reserve Corps may be enrolled in the Naval Reserve Force in their present grades and ranks.

In referring to the act of August 29, 1916, I do not find any provision for the Dental Corps or the Medical Corps under the Naval Reserve forces. If we repeal that law, then we will have no law with regard to the Medical Corps or the Dental Corps.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, yes; you would. The Medical Reserve Corps and the Dental Reserve Corps were created under other acts as a part of the reserve. When they are incorporated into it they become a part of the Naval Reserve Force. It is just simply an additional branch of that.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; but if we repeal all of the laws covering those two we will have no law at all.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; you will. You will have the act of August 29, 1916, the reserve force that gives them all of their rights as a part and parcel of the Naval Reserve Force.

Mr. GOOD. But I do not find under the act of August 29 any provision regarding the Medical Corps or the Dental Reserve Corps in the Naval Reserve Force. That is provided for on pages 20 and 21 under the Medical Reserve Corps and Dental Reserve Corps.

Mr. PADGETT. Where?

Mr. GOOD. But the provision in regard to the Naval Reserve Force——

Mr. PADGETT. What page is the gentleman talking about?

Mr. GOOD. Commencing on page 35 of the act.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman means the act of August, 1916?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; but it simply gives them, or, rather, I should say, they just come bodily in and get the benefits of the Medical Reserve Corps just like the Flying Naval Reserve or the Naval Reserve or the Naval Auxiliary Reserve or all of these others. There is general legislation creating the reserve, and these men come into it and become a part of it, and they are incorporated in there with the same rank that they have now and then become a part of the Naval Reserve.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman may be right about that.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not think there is any conflict about it. There is no objection at all, and it has been all worked out.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. When this paragraph becomes effective the Naval Marine Corps Reserve and State organizations will still remain in existence and the National Naval Volunteers as an organization will pass out of existence?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUSTED. That is correct?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs I think has given a very comprehensive explanation of the provisions of the paragraph to which I reserve the point of order and also the following paragraph down to the middle of page 17 and as I understand they all relate to this transfer and the continuation, so to speak, of this force——

Mr. PADGETT. It is a simplification of them; it is consolidating into one three organizations.

Mr. WALSH. I have read its provisions very carefully and as the questions have been answered I think that the plan is worthy of adoption and I am therefore going to withdraw the point of order, and I would suggest to the Chairman that if there be any discussion of the matter that the Clerk might read the paragraph to the middle of page 17 and debate be upon it as a whole.

Mr. PADGETT. I will be very glad to have that done. There are two verbal amendments which I wish to offer, and if we can read the whole as one paragraph, then I can offer those amendments.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. BUTLER. Then the gentleman had better ask permission.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at the end of line 23, page 10.

Mr. PADGETT. As I said to the gentleman when he was talking to me a while ago in reference to his amendment, I would like to look into it and I will ask the gentleman if he will not withhold it and then I will ask to return to that paragraph.

Mr. GOOD. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. PADGETT. And then the gentleman can offer his amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he adopt the suggestion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts and read this as one paragraph.

Mr. PADGETT. I am going to ask that.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to ask if it is possible under unanimous-consent agreement to defer the reading of these seven long pages of closely printed matter?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules of the House they have to be read; the House can do anything by unanimous consent, but it would be unusual.

Mr. PADGETT. I would not want to put in the RECORD that we waived the actual reading. I do not think that would be proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his point of order; and the gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be permitted to read down to the middle of page 17, all the matter so read to be considered as one paragraph, and after it is read the part so read be open to amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all members of the National Naval Volunteers for aeronautic duties only are hereby transferred to the Naval Reserve Flying Corps, and that all members of the National Naval Volunteers of the Marine Corps branch are hereby transferred to the Marine Corps Reserve under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

That all laws heretofore enacted by Congress relating to the Medical Reserve Corps and Dental Reserve Corps be, and the same hereby are, repealed: Provided, That members of the Medical Reserve Corps and Dental Reserve Corps may be enrolled in the Naval Reserve Force in their present grades and ranks.

That the provisions of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, are hereby amended as follows:

Strike out that part of the fourth paragraph under the subcaption "Fleet Naval Reserve," which reads as follows: "Men enrolled in the Fleet Naval Reserve with less than 8 years' naval service shall be paid at the rate of $50 per annum, those with 8 or more years' and less than 12 years' naval service shall be paid at the rate of $72 per annum; and those with 12 or more years' naval service shall be paid at the rate of $100 per annum, such pay to be considered as retainer pay for the obligation on the part of such members to serve in the Navy in time of war or national emergency," and substitute therefor the following:

"The retainer pay of the enrolled men of the Fleet Naval Reserve shall be the same as for the enrolled men of the Naval Reserve and shall be computed in like manner: Provided, That nothing herein shall operate to reduce the retainer pay allowed by existing law to enlisted men who, after 16 years' or more naval service, are transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve," nor to deny to such enlisted men their privilege of retirement upon completing 30 years' naval service as now provided by law.

Strike out the first paragraph under the subcaption "Naval Reserve" and substitute the following:

"Members of the Naval Reserve Force who have enrolled for general service and are citizens of the United States are eligible for membership in the Naval Reserve. No person shall be enrolled in or transferred to this class unless he establishes satisfactory evidence as to his qualifications for duty on board combatant ships of the Navy."

That the age limits for the several ranks, grades, and ratings and on first enrollment in the Naval Reserve shall be as prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

That the minimum active service required for maintaining the efficiency of a member of the Naval Reserve shall be two months during each term of enrollment and an attendance at not less than 36 drills during each year, or other equivalent duty. The active service may be in one period or in periods of not less than 15 days each.

That the annual retainer pay of members of the Naval Reserve Force, except officers in the Naval Auxiliary Reserve, after confirmation in rank, grade, or rating, shall be the equivalent of two months' base pay of the corresponding rank, grade, or rating in the Navy, but the highest base pay upon which the retainer pay of officers of the Naval Reserve Force shall be computed shall not be greater than the base pay of a lieutenant commander. Service in the Navy, Marine Corps, National Naval Volunteers, and Naval Militia shall be counted as continuous service in the Naval Reserve Force, both for the purpose of retirement and of computing retainer pay: Provided, That no member of the Naval Reserve Force shall be eligible for retirement other than for physical disability incurred in line of duty until he has completed at least two continuous enrollments in the Naval Reserve Force: Provided further, That no retainer pay of any member of the Naval Reserve Force except those enlisted men transferred to the Fleet Naval Reserve after 16 or 20 or more years' naval service shall be in excess of the amount authorized to members having had 16 years' continuous service therein.

That in time of peace the Secretary of the Navy is authorized, in his discretion, to order any member of the Naval Reserve Force, with his consent, who has been confirmed in his rank, grade, or rating, to perform any duty afloat for any period of time for which his services may be required: Provided, That such members may be relieved from duty by the Secretary of the Navy at any time and shall upon their own application be released from said duty within four months from the date of their application therefor.

That the uniform gratuity for the enlisted men of each class of the Naval Reserve Force shall be the same as that prescribed for enlisted men of the Navy, but in time of peace the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe the portion of the clothing gratuity to be issued to such enlisted men of the Naval Reserve Force.

That in time of peace no member of any class of the Naval Reserve Force shall be entitled to retainer pay when assigned permanently to active duty.

That no part of the clothing gratuity credited to members of the Naval Reserve Force shall be deducted from their accounts where said members accept temporary appointments in the Navy in time of war or other national emergency.

That members of the Naval Reserve Force shall upon reaching the age of 64 years be disenrolled except that in time of war or other national emergency such members of the Naval Reserve Force, if in active service, may be continued therein during such period as the Secretary of the Navy may determine, but not longer than six months after said war or other national emergency shall cease to exist.

That no officer of any class of the Naval Reserve Force shall in time of peace be promoted above the grade of lieutenant commander, but in time of war or other national emergency officers of the Naval Reserve Force of and above the rank of lieutenant commander in active service shall be eligible for selection for promotion to the next higher grade or rank by the same board of officers that selects officers of the United States Navy for promotion to such higher ranks and grades, under the same rules and regulations as apply to the selection for promotion of officers of the United States Navy. The promotion of officers of the Naval Reserve Force below the rank of lieutenant commander shall at all times be in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe.

That when on active duty officers of the Naval Reserve Force shall take precedence among themselves and with other officers of the naval service in their respective grades or ranks according to the dates of their commissions or provisional assignment of rank in the Naval Reserve Force: Provided, That all officers of the Naval Reserve Force of and above the rank of lieutenant commander shall rank with but after officers of the same rank or grade in the United States Navy, except that in time of war or other national emergency such officers of the Naval Reserve Force shall have a date of precedence with officers of the United States Navy as of the date of general mobilization, to be established by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided further, That during the present emergency the date of precedence of all officers of the Naval Reserve Force shall be as prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

No officer of the Naval Coast Defense Reserve or officer of the Naval Reserve Flying Corps shall exercise command except within their particular department or service for the due performance of his respective duties.

Officers and enlisted men of the Naval Reserve Force when employed in active service, ashore or afloat, under the Navy Department shall receive the same pay and allowances as received by the officers and enlisted men of the Regular Navy of the same rank, grades, or ratings and of the same length of service, which shall include service in the Navy, Marine Corps, Naval Reserve Force, Naval Militia, and National Naval Volunteers.

That the unexpended and unobligated portion of all moneys heretofore appropriated, and the appropriation authorized by section 10 of Public No. 57, Sixty-third Congress, approved February 16, 1914, for the training and equipment of the Naval Militia and the National Naval Volunteers, for the clerical force and the office expenses of the Division of Naval Militia Affairs, and the property loaned by the Navy Department for the arming and equipping of the Naval Militia shall be, and hereby are, made available for training and equipping the Naval Reserve Force and for the purchase, rental, and maintenance of suitable armories therefor.

That the clerical force and office expenses provided for the Division of Naval Militia Affairs shall be transferred to the Bureau of Navigation.

Enrolled members of the Naval Reserve Force when in active service shall be subject to the laws, regulations, and orders for the government of the Regular Navy, and the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, permit the members of the Naval Reserve Force to wear the uniform of their respective ranks, grades, or ratings while not in active service, and such members shall, for any act committed by them while wearing the uniform of their respective ranks, grades, or ratings, be subject to the laws, regulations, and orders for the government of the Regular Navy.

That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, on page 11, line 22, after the word "reserve," I want to strike out the quotation marks.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. And on line 24, page 11, after the word "law," reinsert the quotation marks.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. On page 13, line 6, beginning with the word "until" and ending with the word "force," in line 8, I want to strike out these words: "until he has completed at least two continuous enrollments in the Naval Reserve Force."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 6, after the word "duty," strike out the following language: "until he has completed at least two continuous enrollments in the Naval Reserve Force."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of that amendment, I want to state, is this: You will notice that the proviso is that "No member of the Naval Reserve Force shall be eligible for retirement other than for physical disability incurred in line of duty until he has completed at least two continuous enrollments in the Naval Reserve Force." Now, a man might enroll from civil life in the Naval Reserve Force and serve eight years and be eligible for retirement. Now, the striking out of those words will limit the right of retirement for disability incurred in the line of duty, and that language is adding to what they have under existing law, and I do not think that a man by enrolling for eight years——

Mr. BUTLER. Ought to be retired.

Mr. PADGETT. Should go on the retired list when in time of peace he has served two months a year for training purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us strike it out.

Mr. PADGETT. I think it ought to be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, then, on page 13, line 23, I want to strike out the words "enlisted men." I will send it up.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 13, line 23, strike out the words "enlisted men", and insert in lieu thereof the words "members other than officers."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. On page 14, line 2, I offer the following amendment. It is the same as the other one.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 2, strike out the words "enlisted men" and insert in lieu thereof the words "members other than officers."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman state why he uses that particular language?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I will state it. Heretofore we have had no persons serving in the Navy except men, persons of the masculine gender. Under the exigencies of this war they have taken some women into the service as "yeowomen." If this language is left "enlisted men" there might be a quibble as to the interpretation, and to avoid that, so that there will be no question as to the women to be paid for doing yeomen's clerical work, we change this language.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. I offer another amendment, Mr. Chairman, on page 14, line 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 6, strike out the word "permanently" and insert after the word "duty" the words "for purposes other than training."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. On page 16, line 3, I offer another amendment about enlisted men. Strike out "enlisted men" and substitute the word "members."

Mr. BUTLER. We are amending this in some particulars so that no exception can be taken of this by members of the Naval Militia?

Mr. PADGETT. No. It is only taking out the words "enlisted men" and inserting "members other than officers" in order to care for the women who have been taken into the service.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. How many women have been taken into the service?

Mr. PADGETT. Well, doing clerical work in the Navy, there have been two or three hundred.

Mr. BUTLER. "Yeoettes" they call them.

Mr. FOSS. They are doing work here in Washington?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; they are doing work here in Washington and in other places.

Mr. BUTLER. Another question. On page 14 you make an amendment "for purposes," and so forth?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. Instead of the word "permanently," which might be construed the permanent Navy, this is "for purposes other than training," so that when they are serving simply for purposes of training they get the two months, as the gentleman will remember.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. When they are called into the general service, as in an emergency, they are to get the benefit provided by law.

Mr. BUTLER. I only asked the question because we all remember that this part of the bill is the result of much conference among the men in the service and the men in the Naval Militia. We are not changing it in any way against their interests.

Mr. PADGETT. There is one change that changes the substance, and that is where we strike out the language authorizing retirement after two enlistments, but they do not have that under existing law. That was incorporated here, and I do not think it should be. I do not take the responsibility for that, because it was not proper.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The substitution of "other than officers" for "enlisted men" is made only in this new part of the law?

Mr. PADGETT. That is all. It is here because they are taking into the Naval Reserve, not into the Navy, these "yeoettes," as they are called, or women.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, referring to page 17, I note that the Secretary of the Navy is given discretion to permit members of the Naval Reserve Force to wear the uniform of the Navy when not on active duty. I would like to ask why that is left in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy? I assume that under that provision he could grant permission to one individual and deny it to others.

Mr. PADGETT. No. It is under regulations prescribed for classes, not individuals.

Mr. HUSTED. Why is it left to the discretion of the Secretary? If it is a good thing to wear the uniform, why not give it to them outright?

Mr. PADGETT. They might want to wear it on special occasions, for instance, in celebrations. It might not be desirable in time of peace that they should wear their uniforms on all occasions and be confused with the men who are regularly in the service, but upon special occasions, under general regulations, for instance, a reunion, or something of that kind, then it could be done.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit me to direct his attention to a typographical error on line 6 of page 17? In the spelling of the word "respective" it is spelled "fecpective."

Mr. PADGETT. I am glad that the gentleman calls attention to that, because in the print I have it is spelled correctly.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it not spelled correctly in the print that the Clerk has?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that it be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be done.

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. With reference to this matter of members of the reserve force wearing the uniform when not in service, why is this permitted at all? It is not done in the Army, is it?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I understand that the members of the reserve force of the Army when not in service are not permitted to wear the uniform.

Mr. PADGETT. I can not say about the Army, because I do not know.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Was there any special reason for this provision?

Mr. PADGETT. I can see where, under regulations that apply generally, there might be occasions when these men would come to celebrate some public day or some event, or something of that kind, when they should come as the naval reserve in their uniforms. I do not see any harm in it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Was this asked for by the department or by the members of the reserve?

Mr. PADGETT. It is asked for by both. This bill was framed by the department and by the Naval Reserve people, the Naval Militia and the Naval Volunteers working together. It is a coordinated bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval training station, California: Maintenance of naval training station, Yerba Buena Island, Cal.: Labor and material; buildings and wharves; general care, repairs, and improvements of grounds, buildings, and wharves; wharfage, ferriage, and street car fare; purchase and maintenance of live stock and attendance on same; wagons, carts, implements, and tools, and repairs to same, including the maintenance, repair, and operation of one horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicle to be used only for official purposes; fire engines and extinguishers; gymnastic implements, models, and other articles needed in instruction of apprentice seamen; printing outfit and materials and maintenance of same; heating and lighting; stationery, books, schoolbooks, and periodicals; fresh water, and washing; packing boxes and materials; and all other contingent expenses; maintenance of dispensary building; lectures and suitable entertainments for apprentice seamen; in all, $225,000.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Nothing can be grander in this world than to fight the battles of liberty. Nothing can be more glorious than to fight in defense of one's country, especially when that country is America—America of proud history and historic origin. Born in a struggle, nurtured in an atmosphere of independence, our forefathers wrung from the hands of British tyranny the unhindered right to be free. All of our national life we have been an independent people, but that independence had to be won on the field of carnage by warriors grim, and having been won it must be maintained, even at the point of the bayonet. No liberty has ever been won by an indifferent people, and no liberty will ever be maintained by an indifferent people. All progress comes through struggle, and in this way only may we achieve.

We are engaged in a contest in which autocracy, avarice, and brutality are pitted against democracy, liberty, and humanity. The Kaiser has sought to place a helmet of despair upon the free peoples of earth, but the mask has been torn away, and his sinister purposes have been revealed. The President has stated our unselfish aims, and the pathway is clear. The issues are unclouded. No American wants to turn back. The course, with all its tremendous issues, leads forward, not backward, upward, not downward, to the rising and not to the setting sun. All other issues must and will be subordinated to the one great task of winning the war in the shortest possible time. All of these matters have been fully discussed in this body, and it would be useless for me to enter into a discussion of the causes of our enforced entry into a conflict that was not of our own choosing.

But I would call your attention to another and newer, though not less important, problem of this war; that is, to the reeducation and retraining of those who are injured in this great struggle. For the first time in all our glorious history we are beginning to think in concrete terms of the returned soldier in the aftermath. Picture in your mind the soldier who goes to the front. Lifting up his eyes he has caught a larger vision of justice for the oppressed peoples of earth and has woven this dream into a conviction. Clinging to this ideal, he bids good-by to his native land with its rocks and hills, its vales and its mountains, its springs, its rivulets, and its rivers. Its pleasant associations and its old home ties he leaves behind. He bids good-by to mother, to wife, to sweetheart, and with a wave of the hand he joins his fellow soldiers, crosses the sea, and proves his devotion to that ideal. Inspired by that hope he cheerfully faces the machine gun, endures the weariness, and undergoes the hardships indescribable. He hears the roar of the cannon, the sharp crack of the rifle, the thundering tread of horsemen. He faces death in a thousand forms, fighting for the greatest Republic that was ever fashioned by human intelligence on this or any other continent since time's auspicious beginning—aye, more, struggling for the triumph of justice for all time and which shall be to all peoples. Finally, in going over the top he loses an arm or leg or a fragment of shell crashes into his body. He would fight on. The spirit is unbroken, but the body falters. He is taken to the rear, and others carry on the struggle to victory. With a thrill of joy he hears of the final triumph.

The foe has been crushed. The Army returns with bands playing and colors flying, and with the world freed from militarism. The country applauds. The citizens turn out en masse to do the soldiers honor, and to crown them with cheers. After the wild music of the parade, the crowds disperse and return to their respective vocations. The soldiers disband. Sad to say, many of them are crippled for life. They are unable to fill their accustomed stations. They face a future of enforced inactivity. If neglected they will become morose, melancholy, and despondent. Man can not live by cheers alone. Used to active life, their spirits long for a place of usefulness. Having fought the world's greatest battle in the conflict of war, they want a real part in the warfare of peace.

To meet this great problem and to lighten in a measure the burdens of those who have willingly suffered that liberty might live, France, England, Canada, and other countries have established vocational schools for the reeducation and retraining of the crippled soldier.

In many instances the returned soldier can no longer do the character of work in which he was engaged when his country called. The purpose of these schools is to refit him for any character of work which in his changed circumstances he is capable, or may be made capable, of performing. I can conceive of no greater sorrow that could come to a man than to be deprived of his accustomed vocation, and yet be unequipped for any other calling. A pension, compensation, insurance money—none of these will satisfy the human longing of an active man to be a real part of life. These are all good. These are all necessary. But the greatest joy that can be brought into a life of this kind is the conscious knowledge of being able to do some useful work, of having a part, though it be a small part, in the commercial fabric and onward progress of this country.

Perhaps Canada has done more than any other country for her injured soldiers, at least she was the first to establish these institutions on a national scale. The success has been marvelous. She has a central authority, a military-hospitals commission, which operates a group of hospitals. The retraining is supervised by what is known as the vocational branch of this commission in connection with departments of education in the different Provinces, thus forming an elastic system. There is a district officer in each Province or group of Provinces who examines the disabled soldier, and if he is unable to return to his work refers him to a training board, of which such district officer, a medical officer, and a vocational committeeman are the constituent members. This board submits a report and recommendation to the military-hospitals commission at Ottawa for approval. If approved the ex-soldier is entered for a course of training and is given a monthly cash allowance.

The length of this training depends upon his condition, mental and physical, his nationality, previous education or training, his adaptability, temperament, desire, and the industrial needs of the country. During this training period single men are furnished board, lodging, laundry, and $8 per month. If a man has a wife or children he is given an extra allowance; all of this in addition to his pension, or compensation as it would be called in this country.

The Province of Alberta has perhaps surpassed all others. A great many have been trained there and hundreds are now in school. Dr. James Miller, district vocational officer, declares that 5 per cent of the total assigned to these schools will ultimately be sent to permanent soldiers' homes, but that the remaining 95 per cent can be rendered capable of some character of useful work. This percentage is based upon those accepted after a survey. However, a noted authority, who has long made a study of this problem—for it must be remembered that there are a few magnificent spirits in this world who have devoted their lives to this problem—declares that of the wounded who take training 40 per cent may be restored with proper training to as great a degree of efficiency in different lines of occupation as they possessed in their chosen calling prior to their injury; that 25 per cent may be measurably restored so that their work will be of considerable value both to themselves and to the community, and so that in many instances they may be made self-supporting; that approximately 20 per cent may be assisted in such a way as to enable them to be of some useful service, and thus not be a complete burden to themselves. Thus 85 per cent, according to this authority, of those who are unfortunate enough to be injured in the struggle in which we are engaged may be helped by a process of training. It would be criminal to neglect or delay a work of this character. It must be remembered, however, that of the wounded only about 20 per cent need vocational training, the remaining ones being able, after treatment, to return to their former work.

In the Province of Alberta there are several schools, about one-half of which are in connection with the military hospital. The men are trained to be masters in their trades. Temporary trades are discouraged, and those are encouraged that will probably be most useful in the aftermath of civilian life. About one-tenth are taking to farming or to some form of agricultural work.

Of course, the first treatment is given in the base hospitals in France, but if his injury is such as to prevent his entering war service again, the injured soldier is transported as soon as possible to his native land for a period of recuperation. Those engaged in the work declare that it is very important that the period of training begin as soon as the patient begins to recuperate; that the zest of learning and of doing something to occupy his mind produces a physical reaction that is very beneficial to the disabled soldier and is a very material aid to his recovery. The preliminary training is all important, as otherwise during the months of enforced idleness mental deterioration affects the physical being and hinders and retards recovery. The mind gradually loses its alertness and activity, until it is almost impossible for the injured person to do either mental or physical work of any appreciable kind or character. On the other hand, it is said that those who take the training become very enthusiastic over their work and over their accomplishments, and in one Province have adopted a bit of doggerel expressive of their attitude, as follows:

Its a long trench that has no turning,
A piffling wage that takes no earning,
And a lazy loon that wants no learning.

Many men who have gone through this process of reeducation and vocational training are holding more lucrative positions than they held prior to their entering military life.

A lumberman, 42 years of age, had his right leg crushed, took training, passed the civil-service examination, and now draws $2,000 in a position with the Canadian customs.

A locomotive fireman returned without his left arm, studied telegraphy, and now has charge of the Canadian Pacific Railway station at $125 per month.

A youth without previous business experience has become principal of a western school.

An Alberta bulletin announces that of 17 West Indians who took training, 9 of whom had both legs off and 8 of whom had lost a foot, several became shoemakers, three garment makers, one a tinsmith, one a chauffeur, and one a stenographer, and all of them are self-supporting.

The military hospitals commission in one of its bulletins states that it—

Will not rest content until every soldier disabled in his country's service has recovered the utmost possible degree of power and energy for success in civilian life. Every man must be enabled to serve his country still in a position profitable both to it and to him—a position, too, in which his restored capacity will be fully employed.

In England, St. Dustin's Hospital for blind soldiers and sailors teaches typewriting, leather work, basket work, rug work, and poultry keeping. Those who have more than one limb gone may secure industrial training at Queen Mary's, at Brighton, and at Queen Mary's Auxiliary Hospital, at Roehampton. There is a similar institution at Kelso, Scotland. The convalescent period is spent at Brighton, and the artificial limbs, their fitting and use, are to be had at Roehampton. At first there was a disposition to want to establish colonies of cripples, but it was soon found that it was better both for the disabled soldiers and the community that they should mix and mingle with the other men and be woven into the fabric of the business community. England, with her 600,000 crippled soldiers at the beginning of this year, would have been in a sad plight but for her forethought in the work of rehabilitation.

In France the Zander methods of treatment of stiff limbs and deformities and the substitution of machine for hand manipulation has for some time been used. This system has now been modified so that a curative treatment is applied with a definite view to the physical effort required in the occupation the man hopes to assume. There are now more than 70 reeducational establishments in France, most of which receive a Government subsidy as well as support from municipal authorities and private subscriptions.

Grand Plais has nearly 3,000 beds, electrical treatment, whirlpool baths, massage, medicinal exercises, and other treatments incident thereto. In one month 420 men returned to active service in the Army from this institution who would otherwise probably have been disabled. St. Maurice is another important institution. At first the French work was directed by several different heads, but it was found wise to unite all, and now there is a single head officer known as the "office national." They now keep a registry of every disabled soldier. Before leaving the hospital a blank is filled showing his injury, previous training, his dependents, aptitude for retraining, and other information.

At the Anglo-Belgium Hospital, at Rowen, the apparatus required was for the most part manufactured in the workshops by the disabled soldiers themselves. They have accommodations for 1,200 men. Forty-three different trades are taught including bookkeeping, shorthand, typewriting, telegraphy, molding in clay, wood carving, drawing, designing, painting, manufacturing of motor vehicles, electrical machinery, tinsmithing, plumbing, tailoring, poultry farming, fur curing, and numerous other trades. The great institution is not only self-supporting but has paid back to the Belgium Government the entire cost of installation. The institution was so located that many of the articles needed by the countries at war could be furnished, and thus a double purpose accomplished. While in the workshops the men are still mobolized and under military discipline, and when a man has become efficient and able to earn a living he is allowed to take his discharge on condition that he first take three months' furlough and has suitable employment or work of his own to do.

The Anglo-Belgium Hospital feeds the Vernon establishment, which is an institution where real work is performed. How much better it is to make useful men out of those who are unfortunate enough to be injured in the service than to leave them to their own loneliness and suffering or to send them to soldiers' homes.

I have introduced a bill calling for the establishment of a Federal board for vocational retraining and providing a plan of cooperation between the State and National Governments in the establishment of institutions for vocational retraining in all the States of the American Union. These institutions would be useful not only for the period of the war and for the training of the soldiers who are injured in the war but if thought advisable they could then be transformed into vocational educational institutions of a permanent nature in this country, a phase of our business life that has already been neglected too long.

I am glad to say that in recognition of the need which this situation presents, Hon. William C. Gorgas, the Surgeon General, has established hospitals in a number of the different cities of this country and is undertaking to affiliate them with some of the industrial activities of the country in such a way as to give, to a degree, vocational training. This is a laudable undertaking, but the question is so extensive in its scope and so limitless in its possibilities that it should be organized on a very great and complete scale, and the Surgeon General's efforts should be supplemented in every possible way. The genius and intelligence of the best business minds of the country should cooperate in this great work. Provision should be made first for the restoration to health wherever practicable and to as great a degree as possible; second, provision should be made for the best training facilities of every kind and character; and, third, a full and complete effort should be made to secure employment for the soldier as soon as his period of training has elapsed. The discharge of the disabled soldier from military service should not occur when unfit for further military service, as has been our custom, but when made as fit as possible to resume the place and position of a civilian, and to have a part in the economy of the things that are to be.

This is a problem that is medical, educational, and industrial. It is far more than this. It embraces all those phases, and in addition thereto embodies the larger and more important question of increasing the industrial efficiency of the Nation. The question of taking care of our national life after the storm of war shall have passed and destruction shall have wrought its havoc will be a pressing one. After the war competition will be keen, and democracy will be put to another test, the taking care of all its citizens and the protecting of their legal rights throughout the world, to the end that there may be a permanent peace founded on justice. By this course of training life will be made worth living to the brave spirits that have given the full measure of devotion to the cause of human liberty.

This is not a matter of charity but a question of simple justice. We are learning to appreciate more and more in this land that a man's property, to which he has title, is not his alone, but is his subject to the rights of the Government of which he is a part, and to which he must look for protection not only for that property but for himself. In the years that are to come no man should have the right to enjoy property that has been safeguarded and protected by any man who has been disabled in the fight to protect his neighbors' rights until the Government has provided that the one making the sacrifice has the best done for him that money and training and kindly interest can procure. The kind of compensation which simply enables a man, through the medium of money, to keep the wolf from the door is but poor compensation, indeed, for the loss of an eye or the shattering of a limb, especially if by the proper course of training that man may be lifted out of a state of possible gloom and made capable of doing useful service. This transformation from a disabled condition to a state of usefulness will also help to solve an industrial problem that might become a burden upon the public.

After the war rehabilitation will not only be needed for the manhood of the country, but for the destruction wrought by the war, and the best energy and the best minds that our country can produce will be brought to bear in the solution of these great problems.

We are fighting the greatest war of all history, settling issues of terrible moment and after a terrible fashion. We are being forged in the fires of a new world relationship, whose ultimate objects shall one day be attained. To the accomplishment of our declared purposes our people are committed; they understand its sacrifices and have caught its militant spirit. From housetop to hilltop, from the factory to the farm, from the Atlantic to the Pacific this great country, cleft by flowing rivers and framed in eternal hills, is ablaze with patriotism to-day, its one supreme purpose being to achieve a victory and to weave that victory into the fabric of a just and lasting peace. Surely those who are injured in a cause like this should be cared for regardless of cost. All they ask is an opportunity, and that much they have a right to demand. America, with the rich experience that has been crowded into the brief span of her existence, can not afford to do less. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval training station, Great Lakes: Maintenance of naval training station: Labor and material; general care, repairs, and improvements of grounds, buildings, and piers; street car fare; purchase and maintenance of live stock, and attendance on same; motor-propelled vehicles, wagons, carts, implements, and tools, and repairs to same, including the maintenance, repair, and operation of one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle, and one horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicle to be used only for official purposes; fire apparatus and extinguishers; gymnastic implements; models and other articles needed in instruction of apprentice seamen; printing outfit and material, and maintenance of same; heating and lighting, and repairs to power-plant equipment, distributing mains, tunnel, and conduits; stationery, books, schoolbooks, and periodicals; washing; packing boxes and materials; lectures and suitable entertainments for apprentice seamen; and all other contingent expenses: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, shall not exceed $6,000; in all, naval training station, Great Lakes, $725,000.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs if it is not his intention to insert certain committee amendments that apply to the Great Lakes Training Station or if it is his intention to take them up later?

Mr. PADGETT. They come under the head of public works.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval War College, Rhode Island: For maintenance of the Naval War College on Coasters Harbor Island, including the maintenance, repair, and operation of one horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicle, to be used only for official purposes; and care of grounds for same, $35,250; services of a professor of international law, $2,000; services of civilian lecturers, rendered at the War College, $300; care and preservation of the library, including the purchase, binding, and repair of books of reference and periodicals, $1,300: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for clerical, inspection, drafting, and messenger service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, shall not exceed $22,500; in all, Naval War College, Rhode Island, $38,850.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee concerning the provision in line 19, page 20, of $2,000 for the services of a professor of international law. How much time does the professor give—evidently not all of his time?

Mr. PADGETT. Not all of it. That appropriation has been carried in the bill for a long time. Heretofore this professor delivered lectures at the War College to the officers upon international law. Now, under war conditions the officers are not there, but he is doing the same work by correspondence with the officers on duty elsewhere.

Mr. FESS. That is satisfactory. Of course, $2,000 would not get a very high-class man if he gave all of his time.

Mr. PADGETT. This has been carried for years at that amount. He does not devote all of his time to it.

Mr. FOSS. I wish to ask a question about the preceding paragraph, about schools and camps of instruction. Is that a new proposition?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir.

Mr. FOSS. It has been in the bill before?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, yes. With the war going on and the number of recruits and reserves, and so forth, this is for their training and development.

Mr. FOSS. How many schools and camps for instruction have we now?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know. We have the regular ones at the Great Lakes, and at San Francisco, and at Newport News, and at Newport, R. I.

Mr. FOSS. And at Jamestown?

Mr. PADGETT. Jamestown, Norfolk, Charleston, Pelham Bay, N. Y., Philadelphia, and every place where they can get men together and train them.

Mr. FOSS. They have been increasing the number of them during the last year, have they?

Mr. PADGETT. Since the war broke out?

Mr. FOSS. But prior to that?

Mr. PADGETT. Prior to that we appropriated only $30,000 a year for summer training. Now we are appropriating nearly two million and three-quarter dollars for the training of all these thousands of men who are coming in.

Mr. FESS. You are utilizing a good many institutions that are not purely governmental also, like the Dunwoodie Institution?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; they are contributing very generously, by making available their grounds and resources.

Mr. FESS. Such as the School of Technology at Boston, the Dunwoodie Institution at Minneapolis, and others. I notice that those are being used.

Mr. PADGETT. The University of Chicago has been very generous, and the State University of Ohio, and various places of that kind.

Mr. BRITTEN. According to the testimony of Admiral Palmer when he was before the committee, we have also students at Hawaii, at the Asiatic station, and in the West Indies, and wherever we have a patrol station.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; wherever we have them they are training the men and developing them.

The Clerk read as follows:

The rank and title of major general of the Marine Corps is hereby created, and the President is authorized to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint one major general of the Marine Corps.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we may finish the reading of all this proposed amendment of the act, and then that I may offer several amendments, without interrupting the reading.

Mr. BRITTEN. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee a question. This is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. BUTLER. What pages is it proposed to read?

Mr. PADGETT. Beginning on page 22 and ending with line 10, on page 29.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee, chairman of the committee, asks unanimous consent that all the bill, from page 23, line 25, down to line 10, page 29, be read without interruption, after which time amendments may be offered to any part of the bill so read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the said act of May 22, 1917, Statutes at Large, volume 40, page 85, be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the word "lieutenant" in lines 5 and 14 of section 4 thereof, and substituting therefor the words "lieutenant commander" and adding at the end of section 4 the following proviso: Provided further, That based on the temporary increase of enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps herein authorized, the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized, in his discretion, temporarily to appoint not exceeding 4 captains and 7 commanders in the Navy selected for promotion under provisions of existing law; and 3 brigadier generals, 12 colonels, and 12 lieutenant colonels in the Marine Corps; said temporary appointments shall continue in force only until otherwise directed by the President or until Congress shall amend or repeal the same and not later than six months after the termination of the present war; by striking out the words "commissioned warrant officers, warrant officers, and" in lines 14 and 15 of section 5 thereof; and by inserting after the semicolon in line 31 of section 5, the following: "Provided further, That temporary appointments as chief warrant officers may be made by the President, with the consent of the Senate," so that said sections, as amended, will read as follows:

"SEC. 4. Additional commissioned officers in the Navy and Marine Corps, based upon the temporary increases herein authorized in the number of enlisted men, shall be temporarily appointed by the President, in his discretion, with the advice and consent of the Senate, not above the grades and ranks of lieutenant commander in the line and staff of the Navy and major in the Marine Corps, the distribution in said grades and ranks to be made in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 29, 1916: Provided, That all temporary original appointments shall be made in the lowest commissioned grades of the line and staff of the Navy and Marine Corps, exclusive of commissioned warrant officers, and that there shall be no permanent or temporary appointments in or permanent or temporary promotions to any grade or rank above that of lieutenant commander in the Navy or major in the Marine Corps by reason of the temporary appointment of officers authorized by this act in excess of the total number of officers authorized by existing law or on account of the increase of enlisted men herein authorized: Provided further, That, during the period of the present war, the deficiency existing prior to the passage of this act in the total number of commissioned officers of the Navy and Marine Corps authorized by the act of August 29, 1916, may also be supplied by temporary appointments in the lowest grades and by temporary promotions to all other grades until a sufficient number of officers shall be available for regular appointment or promotion in accordance with existing law: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be held or construed to limit or abridge the use or service of the officers of the Navy and Marine Corps on the retired list or of the officers of the Naval Militia and National Naval Volunteers, Naval Reserve Force, and Marine Corps Reserve, as provided and authorized under existing law: Provided further, That temporary chaplains and temporary acting chaplains in the Navy may be appointed for service during the period of the war in the promotion of the personnel of the Navy as now prescribed by existing law: Provided further, That, based on the temporary increase of enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps herein authorized, the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized, in his discretion, temporarily to appoint not exceeding 4 captains and 7 commanders in the Navy selected for promotion under provisions of existing law; and 3 brigadier generals, 12 colonels, and 12 lieutenant colonels in the Marine Corps; said temporary appointments shall continue in force only until otherwise directed by the President or until Congress shall amend or repeal the same and not later than six months after the termination of the present war.

"SEC. 5. That the additional temporary officers authorized in the various grades and ranks of the Navy and Marine Corps in accordance with the next preceding section may be temporarily appointed to serve in the grades or ranks to which appointed or promoted by the temporary advancement of officers holding permanent and probationary commissions, by temporary appointment of commissioned warrant officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Navy, and warrant officers, noncommissioned officers, and clerks to assistant paymasters of the Marine Corps, commissioned and warrant officers of the United States Coast Guard, citizens of the United States who have had previous naval or military service or training, and other citizens of the United States specially qualified: Provided, That in making appointments authorized herein the maximum age limit shall be 50 years for enlisted men to ensign, enlisted men of the Navy to warrant rank, candidates for assistant surgeon, noncommissioned officers of the Marine Corps to commissioned rank, members of the Marine Corps branch of the Naval Militia and National Naval Volunteers, Marine Corps Reserve, and civilians specially qualified to commissioned rank, and warrant officers of the active list of the Marine Corps appointed to commissioned rank, and temporary chaplains and temporary acting chaplains: Provided further, That graduates of the Naval Academy and warrant officers duly commissioned in the Navy or Marine Corps in accordance with existing law shall not, by virtue of this act, be required to receive temporary appointments; and the class of midshipmen graduated from the Naval Academy on March 29, 1917, and the classes to be graduated hereby may be commissioned effective from date of graduation: Provided further, That temporary appointments as warrant officers of the Navy may be made by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided further, That temporary appointments as chief warrant officers may be made by the President with the consent of the Senate: Provided further, That lieutenants (junior grade) and ensigns may be considered eligible for temporary promotions to the grades of lieutenant and lieutenant (junior grade), respectively, without regard to length of service in grade."

That hereafter the Chief of Naval Operations shall receive the allowances which are now or may hereafter be prescribed by or in pursuance of law for the grade of general in the Army, and the officers of the Navy holding the rank and title of admiral and vice admiral in the Navy while holding such rank and title shall receive the allowances of a general and lieutenant general of the Army, respectively. And hereafter chiefs of bureaus of the Navy Department, including the Judge Advocate General of the Navy, shall, while so serving, have corresponding rank and shall receive the same pay and allowances as are now or may hereafter be prescribed by or in pursuance of law for chiefs of bureaus of the War Department and the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

That nothing contained in this section shall be construed to reduce the pay or allowances now authorized by law for any commissioned, warrant, or appointed officer or any enlisted man of the active or retired lists of the Navy, and all laws inconsistent with the provisions of this section are hereby repealed.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I will not consume the five minutes, but I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a few short remarks made by Food Commissioner Hoover to the Hotel Men's Association in response to their pledging their whole-hearted support to the maintenance of a wheatless program until the end of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I could not understand what the remarks were.

Mr. ELSTON. Short remarks made by Mr. Hoover, who met the National Hotel Men's Association, in response to the chairman of that association pledging their whole-hearted support to the maintenance of a wheatless program until the end of the war.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer several amendments. First, I want to offer one on page 22, line 18, to strike out the word "section" and in lieu thereof to insert the words "and second section."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 18, strike out the word "section" and insert in lieu thereof "and second section."

Mr. PADGETT. I want to insert "first and second sections," because we are amending both the first and the second sections.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. On page 23, line 12, at the beginning of the line, insert "Section 2."

Page 23, line 12, before the word "that" insert "Section 2."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. In line 14, page 23, strike out the words "thirty thousand to fifty thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "seventeen thousand four hundred to seventy-five thousand five hundred."

I want to state to the committee that the effect of that amendment is to increase the enlisted personnel of the Marine Corps from 30,000 to 75,500, on account of the word we have received from abroad and the request of Gen. Pershing and the Secretary of War that additional marines be sent abroad. As we have a number of highly trained marines ready to send, it is the purpose and intention of the Navy Department to comply with that request, and it becomes necessary to grant an additional increase. This is a committee amendment that was agreed to unanimously without any opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his amendment again?

Mr. PADGETT. In line 14 strike out the words "thirty thousand to fifty thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "seventeen thousand four hundred to seventy-five thousand five hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 14, strike out the words "thirty thousand to fifty thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "seventeen thousand four hundred to seventy-five thousand five hundred.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman why he inserts "17,400"?

Mr. PADGETT. Seventeen thousand four hundred is the permanent strength of the Marine Corps.

Mr. FOSS. That is, the Marine Corps will go back to that after the war?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; that is what we will go back to after the war, unless there is subsequent legislation changing it.

Mr. FOSS. What is the temporary increase at the present time?

Mr. PADGETT. Thirty thousand; and those are the words used here. But as it is a temporary increase, that temporary increase should be made from the basis of the permanent increase, and as it was phrased in the bill as reported it was increasing it from a temporary increase, and that increase should be based on the permanent strength.

Mr. FOSS. So that at the present time we have really a temporary increase of 12,600?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the parts of the bill to which I called the attention of the House when I urged expedition this forenoon. It will not be out of place, perhaps, to say here that we hope within 30 days the marines may be increased on the fighting line in France to a division of men. [Applause.] Therefore it becomes necessary to ask for this increase in order that the wastage may be taken care of. A division, as I understand, will mean about 28,000 men. We will have to have replacements, so that when casualties occur we will have a supply to draw from immediately. When the marines go, let me say to the House—and I am willing to have this appear in the RECORD—they will go thoroughly equipped. They will take men who have been trained for months under the cannon fire, what is known as barrage. These men will leave America directly for the front, with no other training, and, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. Foss] suggests, there is a lot of them over there now.

Mr. BRITTEN. Right on the firing line.

Mr. BUTLER. Right on the fighting line. Therefore I think that the Naval Affairs Committee of the House was justified, in view of what the chairman of our committee has said and what I am now saying, in asking for expedition in the passage of this bill. These men must be supplied and supplied at once. Let me further say to this committee that during the month of May they will have no trouble whatever in enlisting 10,000 marines. Let me say further, for the information of the committee, that thousands and thousands of men are standing waiting to be enlisted in the Marine Corps, men of the highest order and character to be found in America. Unless we can have this legislation and authorize headquarters to take these men we will be at a disadvantage.

When these marines go to Europe they will take with them 2,000 expert riflemen; they will take with them a class of men 92 per cent of whom are sharpshooters. Furthermore, when they go they will take their own flying machines. We want to see this body of expert soldiers in Europe immediately, and that is the reason why I ask for expedition. [Applause.]

I want this committee to know the reason why I asked for expedition, and I have now given it. You may expect good results from these men who have been trained, some of them one year, some six, and some eight.

Mr. COX. I think the gentleman ought to be commended.

Mr. BUTLER. And following up what my young friend from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] said the other day, it all appears now plain why they have not gone. They were waiting for Gen. Pershing to make the statement that he desired them to put among his own men, and they will all be soldiers, when they reach there, in Pershing's Army. The chairman of this committee has stated that Gen. Pershing has asked for them. He has asked for many more, and now let me say to you that they will fully sustain the reputation that the American people have given to this corps for 140 years and more. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise his remarks, and that will give him authority to cut out such parts as he desires. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I think this is an opportune time to say just a few words about some of the officers of the Marine Corps and the corps generally. My good friend and colleague on the committee, Mr. BUTLER, has always stood for that which the Marine Corps desired, morning, noon, and night. The committee, generally, I think, is almost unanimously for anything the Marine Corps wants.

I want to call to the attention of the House a little incident that occurred the other day when I left Chicago. A young man stepped up to me in one of the big garages, where I was getting my car out to send down here, and he said, "Mr. BRITTEN, I think I shall go back into the Marine Corps." He was a young mechanic about the garage. And I said, "Back into the Marine Corps?" He said, "Yes; I think I shall go back into the Marine Corps, and if I go back, will you help me get under Col. Butler?"

I said, "Do you know Col. Butler?" He said, "Yes; I have fought under him, and there is not a man in the country I would rather go to Europe under than Col. Butler." Mr. Chairman, that same Col. Smedley Butler is none other than the distinguished son of a distinguished father, my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BUTLER. [Applause.]

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The fourth precinct in the city of Yankton, S. Dak., which is the city in which I live, has 240 voters. To show how they have subscribed to the third liberty loan, I send to the desk the following telegram and ask that it be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

YANKTON, S. DAK., April 19, 1918.

Hon. C. H. DILLON,
Washington, D. C.:

Fourth precinct, city of Yankton, voting population 240 individuals. Subscribers to third liberty loan, 313; total subscription, $70,400; allotment, $35,000. We challenge any precinct in the United States to beat the number of subscribers for precinct population.

WM. J. FANTLE.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, strike out all of lines 21, 22, 23, and 24 and in lieu thereof insert the following: "The rank and title of major general is hereby created in the Marine Corps, and the President is authorized to nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint one major general, who shall at all times be junior in rank to the major general commandant; and also one temporary major general in the Marine Corps who shall at all times be junior to the permanent major general."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer another amendment. I will have to give it to the Clerk. Page 24, line 11, strike out the word "three" and substitute "six." That gives six temporary brigadiers general instead of three.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 11, strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof the word "six."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. This is only temporary?

Mr. PADGETT. It is temporary for the war and six months thereafter. The existing law provides that all of these temporary officers must go out not exceeding six months after the termination of the war.

Mr. BUTLER. I just wanted to hear the gentleman say it again, that is all.

Mr. PADGETT. I have put it in here time and again.

Mr. BUTLER. I like to hear it.

Mr. PADGETT. I offer the following amendment: Page 24, line 12, strike out the word "twelve," before the word "colonels," and insert "twenty-two."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 12, before the word "colonels," strike out the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-two."

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether he thinks we have not plenty of colonels?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not with the increased——

Mr. BUTLER. My question was this: Does the gentleman think we have plenty of colonels? and the answer was, "No; we have not."

Mr. PADGETT. No; I said we had not, authorized by existing law. I took up this matter yesterday with Gen. Barnett, and this is not one-third of what they would be if they were operating under the law of August 29, 1916.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say to the gentleman I am going to be as good as I know how in these troublesome times, but if this was in peace times you could not get it through without dragging it around the House several times.

Mr. PADGETT. I would not ask for it.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: Page 24, line 12, before the word "lieutenants," strike out "twelve" and insert "twenty-two."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 12, before the word "lieutenants," strike out the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-two."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, in line 13, after the word "corps," I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 13, after the word "corps" and before the semicolon, insert the following: "in addition to the number permanently allowed by law in these grades."

Mr. PADGETT. Showing they are temporary and in addition to the permanent colonels, that is all.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, page 26, line 19, it is the same amendment I offered a while ago, in line 19, strike out the word "three" and insert "six."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 19, strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof "six."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. In the same line 12, same page, strike out the word "twelve" before the semicolon and insert "twenty-two."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 19, before the word "colonels," strike out the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-two."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. In the same line, before the word "lieu," strike out the word "twelve" and insert "twenty-two."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 19, before the word "lieu," strike out the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-two."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Page 26, line 20, after the words "Marine Corps," and before the semicolon, insert the words I sent up a while ago, "in addition to the number permanently allowed by law in those grades."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 20, after the word "Corps," and before the semicolon, insert the following: "in addition to the number permanently allowed by law in those grades."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. On page 26, line 11, there is an error there of a misprint. I move to strike out the word "promotion" and insert "proportion."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 26, line 11, strike out the word "promotion" and insert in lieu thereof the word "proportion."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Page 27, lines 22 and 23, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, lines 22 and 23, strike out the words "and warrant officers of the active list of the Marine Corps appointed to commissioned rank."

Mr. PADGETT. This strikes out the words "and warrant officers of the active list of the Marine Corps appointed to commissioned rank." Under the act of August 29, 1916, there was a limitation on the promotion or the appointment of men to the rank of ensign before the age of 50. Now the age of retirement in the Navy is 64. There is 14 years of service. Now, these warrant officers that have been serving and possessed capacity and character and have served up to 50 years under the existing law could not be promoted to ensign. This simply exempts them from that limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the chairman of the committee any other amendment?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. I offer another amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PADGETT moves to insert the following, on page 27, line 14, after the word "Provided": "That such chief warrant officers as are given a temporary appointment provided herein shall take rank and precedence with the other chief warrant officers temporarily appointed as of July 1, 1917, and according to their seniority as chief warrant officers in the permanent service: Provided further."

Mr. BUTLER. The chairman will understand that this affects the very desirable personnel of this Marine Corps, and therefore I understand from his amendment that the chief warrant officers that are taken into the service temporarily will rank along with those who are in permanently, not taking precedence over them?

Mr. PADGETT. It fixes the date as of July 1, and among the officers according to their precedence it is to establish military uniformity.

Mr. BUTLER. I would not want these men who have been taken in temporarily to have precedence over the old fellows who have done good work for the Government for many years.

Mr. PADGETT. It is not intended that that should be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the chairman any other amendment?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. On page 28, line 6, change the word "hereby" to "hereafter." It is a misprint. It is the classes to be graduated hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PADGETT: Page 28, line 6, strike out "hereby" and insert "hereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, on page 28, line 11, after the word "Senate," I wish to offer an additional proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PADGETT: Page 28, line 11, after the word "Senate," insert the following additional proviso: "Provided further, That the temporary appointment for the war of 76 additional marine gunners, 76 additional quartermaster clerks, and 29 additional clerks for assistant paymasters in the Marine Corps is authorized."

Mr. PADGETT. This is the temporary appointment of these additional marine gunners and quartermaster clerks and assistant pay clerks on account of the increase in the Marine Corps from 30,000 to 75,000.

Mr. BUTLER. All temporary?

Mr. PADGETT. All temporary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, on page 28, line 24, after the word "Navy," I move to insert the words "and the heads of existing staff corps of the Marine Corps." That places them on the same basis.

Mr. BUTLER. That I am going to object to. You will have to have a full House to get it through.

Mr. PADGETT. I will leave it out, then.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is a very important question, Mr. Chairman. If the question has merit in it, it should be considered whether it requires the entire House or not.

Mr. BUTLER. That means to appoint three major generals in the staff corps of the Marine Corps?

Mr. PADGETT. It means to give the heads of three bureaus in the staff corps the same temporary grade—that is, while they are serving in that capacity, the same rank—that they would have in the Navy and in the Army.

Mr. BUTLER. I will say right now that I will not play any longer. [Laughter.]

Mr. PADGETT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague on the committee allow me a minute to change his views on this subject?

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman should talk three years I would listen to him, because I like him, but he could not change my opinion, because it is not right to take advantage of the condition we are in to have three major generals of the staff and when this war is over the line will have only one, the fighting men one, and the staff three. Never; if you want to, I will fight it out along that line.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what the status of the amendment would be if it is withdrawn now? I would like to know from the chairman of the committee if it is going to be reintroduced?

Mr. PADGETT. Not by myself. I can withdraw it at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that in the House the proposer of an amendment has the right to withdraw it at any time, but in Committee of the Whole, under the practice, it takes unanimous consent to withdraw it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I hate awfully to disagree with my pleasant friend [Mr. BUTLER] on the Committee on Naval Affairs, but here is the situation with reference to these staff officers: They are occupying the same relative positions in the Marine Corps that are occupied by officers in the Army and officers in the Navy doing their character of duty, and we now are going to single out these three officers, and we are going to say to them, "You stay where you are as brigadier generals. We are going to keep major generals in the Army doing the same character of work that you are doing; we are going to keep officers of corresponding rank in the Navy, rear admirals, doing the same work you are doing, but we are going to keep you down to brigadier generals, because the corps is small and because after the war is over we may have only one major general in the Marine Corps, and he will be a fighting man and you gentlemen are not fighting men."

Now, let us see if that is fair. I know every Member now on the floor of the House wants to be fair, and particularly so with the Marine Corps. Let us see if that is fair. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] a few moments ago remarked about these glorious troops going over to France, thoroughly equipped with machine guns, supplies, and fully officered. They have acquired their own aeroplanes, and they are a corps to be proud of. Yet these very three officers, the paymaster of the Marine Corps, the adjutant and inspector of the Marine Corps, and the quartermaster of the Marine Corps are directly responsible, under Gen. Barnett, for this wonderful state of affairs. But we are going to say to them, "You are responsible for this great efficiency. You have supplied these troops with the guns and with the uniforms and everything that is necessary for them to go immediately into the battle field, but now we are going to keep you down to brigadier generals, because we do not think it is quite fair for you three to go up. We are not going to raise you to the level of the officers in the Army who are doing the work that you are doing or to the level of the officers in the Navy who are doing the work that you are doing." Is there any reason, in all justice, why these three particular men, who are doing the same duty that others are doing, should be so embarrassed in the eyes of the country?

If you are going to keep them down, then reduce all of the others to a corresponding rank. Then I will say there is some justice in this thing.

If the Marine Corps were not thoroughly supplied right up to the minute, I would say yes, that it would be a rebuke from Congress to these men for not keeping the corps up to what it ought to be. You gentlemen all know Rear Admiral McGowan, of the Navy, and there is no better supply officer living than McGowan. Yet I will say to you that Laurie McCauley in the Marine Corps is his equal in every particular. The most wonderful efficiency possible is demonstrated in the Marine Corps; but we are going to say to McCauley, "You are doing the same work that McGowan is doing, you are doing the same work that major generals in the Army are doing, supplying troops, but we are going to keep you down to a brigadier general."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. May I proceed for two minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Brig. Gen. Henry Lauchheimer, the corps adjutant and inspector, is on the job morning, noon, and night, and is one of the most efficient public servants in our entire Government, not excepting any branch of the Government. I know that Lauchheimer is one of the most efficient men we have. He is on the job 24 hours a day, if need be, and yet you hesitate to do him the same honor and justice you have extended to others. Brig. Gen. George Richards, paymaster of the corps, is the same kind of a man, always at his post; and we are going to say to these three men, "Your corps probably is the most efficient fighting unit on earth, but we can not recognize your value." They talk about the efficiency of the Navy. No one loves the Navy more than I do, and yet I say to you gentlemen, in all seriousness, that the Marine Corps is better equipped for fighting to-day with any enemy of its size than the Navy itself is, and these three men are largely responsible for that state of affairs—the adjutant general, the paymaster, and the quartermaster. I called up Gen. Barnett only a few minutes ago, and I said, "General, have you heard what the committee and the House did on your increases?" He said, "No; I have not." I said, "They have given you exactly what you have asked for, 75,500 men, notwithstanding that the Secretary of the Navy recommended a lesser number to the committee." The committee unanimously gave the Marine Corps just exactly what Gen. Barnett asked for, excepting this particular item here. Gen. Barnett asked for this. He begs for it, and says the efficiency of his corps, in its equipment, in its readiness to fight, is due almost entirely to these three bureaus. We are going to say to them, "We are not going to put you on the same level with your corresponding officers in the Army and the Navy. No; we are going to keep you down." If the Marine Corps were not properly supplied and equipped, I would say, "Yes; keep them down"; but if they are properly supplied and equipped and, as my friend from Pennsylvania said a few minutes ago, ready to fight and go to Europe to-day if you have got the transportation for them, let us give these three officers the same credit, the same distinction, the same glory, and the same salary that goes to corresponding positions in the Navy and the Army. I am willing to rest the matter with the fairness and justice that the House always displays in matters of this kind. [Applause.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, of course you understand what this means. All the grades that we have raised the marines to to-day are temporary except these. When this war is over the Marine Corps will again resolve itself into a force of 17,000 men. The head of the corps is a major general. One major general is provided permanently. One major general is included in this bill, to be provided temporarily. All those men lose their grades at the conclusion of the war except those now considered. And I will say now, Mr. Chairman, there are always plenty of men here in the House to stand up for the men who do not go to war. I always stand up for the fighting men. Now, do this thing if you want to, and when the war is over you will have three major generals on the staff in this little corps, and only one among the fighting men. Are you going to do it? Will you agree to the proposed amendment?

Who makes the corps? It is true that I never knew a more efficient quartermaster than McCauley. I knew him before you drew a breath. I know these men well. You can not praise them too highly but what I will try to help you. But I will not consent to giving these same men, stationed always in Washington, these grades, to the disadvantage of the fighting men of the Marine Corps.

Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee did not offer this amendment before the committee this morning. I heard that he had it; if he had, I would have made my protest there as I make it here.

I say now, at the risk of being called unpatriotic or disloyal, that I will fight this amendment to the last ditch. Too bad, taking advantage of the present trouble to favor friends of men in the effort to obtain increase in grades. Two years ago the heads of these departments were colonels. Now they are brigadiers, and their friends now ask them to be made major generals. For one, I will not submit to it, because it is not right.

What are you going to do with the fighting men? You give them temporary grades only. They may lose an arm or a leg, and they will go back to their permanent grades—captains, majors, and colonels. Let all of these men retain these grades and ranks. Are you going to do a thing so unfair toward the men who are to draw the blood of our enemies at the great risk of spilling their own?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the President is hereby authorized to drop from the rolls of the Navy or Marine Corps any officer thereof who is absent from duty without leave for a period of three months or more, or who, having been found guilty by the civil authorities of any offense, is finally sentenced to confinement in a State or Federal penitentiary: Provided, That no officer so dropped shall be eligible for reappointment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to move to strike out lines 23 and 24, on page 29, and lines 1 to 5, inclusive, on page 30. It has already been enacted into law.

Mr. WALSH. Then I withdraw the reservation of my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his point of order, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 23, strike out all of the language beginning with the word "That," on line 23, to and including the word "reappointment," on line 5, page 30.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter, during the existence of war or of a national emergency declared by the President to exist, any commissioned or warrant officer of the Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard of the United States on the retired list may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be ordered to active duty at sea or on shore; and any retired officer performing such active duty in time of war or national emergency, declared as aforesaid, shall be entitled to promotion on the retired list to the grade or rank, not above that of lieutenant commander in the Navy or major in the Marine Corps or captain in the Coast Guard, and shall thereafter receive the pay and allowances thereof, which his total active service as an officer both prior and subsequent to retirement, in the manner rendered by him, would have enabled him to attain in due course of promotion had such service been rendered continuously on the active list during the period of time last past.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this is a section which gives permanent rank to the retired officers after the war is over.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; there is a separate bill pending for that, and if the gentleman from Alabama objects to it I will move to strike it out and we will fight it out on a separate bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think that is better.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out on page 30, from line 6, page 30, to and including line 19 on page 31. There are two paragraphs.

Mr. BUTLER. This is a provision we put in in the committee on a division?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and I stated then if there was a fight on it I would not insist on it.

Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent to strike that out, because the two paragraphs are all the same proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to strike out the language beginning with line 6, page 30, down to line 19, page 31. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter the allowances of officers, enlisted men, and student fliers of the naval service shall in no case be increased by reason of the performance of aviation duty.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to ask the Chairman if the present law does not give men in the actual flying service increased compensation?

Mr. PADGETT. This does not interfere with compensation at all. Under the law student fliers get 35 per cent increased pay while engaged in actual flying and qualified fliers get 50 per cent. But the law that was passed embraced allowances also. For instance, traveling from one place to another under the general law, ordinary service, a man would get 8 cents a mile. This would give the flier 12 cents a mile. It does not cost him any more to travel than it does anybody else. If he gets commutation of rations, he would get 35 or 50 per cent more than the ordinary man. This is only as far as the allowance is concerned, and leaves his increased pay untouched.

Mr. WALSH. On what theory were the allowances increased?

Mr. PADGETT. We did not realize that they were getting an increased allowance. We intended originally to give them increased pay and the ordinary allowances. It was so framed that the increase applied not only to the pay but the allowances. That is the interpretation placed upon it by the paying officers, and this will only give them the same commutation of allowances that everybody else gets but leaves the increase of pay the same.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter all candidates for admission to the Naval Academy must be between the ages of 16 and 20 years on July 1 of the calendar year in which they enter the academy: Provided, That the foregoing shall not apply to candidates for midshipmen designated for entrance to the academy in 1918

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that. I would state now, for information, what that amendment is. On line 24, page 31, I desire to strike out the words "between the ages of 16 and 20 years on July," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "not less than 16 years of age nor more than 20 years of age on April." That makes it definite. The examinations are now held, some in February and some in April—about the middle of April. Under the law authorizing Members of the House and Senate to appoint the age depends upon the date of examination, which is a varying date. It has been held as late as July, so that there would be an age in February, an age in April, and an age if another was held later. Under the law authorizing the appointment of men from the service it provides that their age is determined upon the date of their admission to the academy, so that you have two laws on the subject. This is intended to fix a definite date of the age, and I have selected the 1st of April because it is practically under the law authorizing the Members to appoint at the present time, the examinations being held in February and in April, and this takes the 1st day of April and provides not less than 16 years of age nor more than 20 years of age on the 1st day of April.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has a special bill pending, which was taken up some few days ago, but was laid aside because of an amendment that was offered.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think a matter of this sort ought to be given a little more consideration than is possible here. As the gentleman proposes to amend, I do not think it would be objectionable; but I think it would be better to have it considered as a separate measure. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman to make a point of order to the entire paragraph?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the matter beginning on page 32, with line 4, and embracing all the remainder of page 32, all of page 33, and on page 34 down to and including line 18, has heretofore been enacted into law. I ask unanimous consent to have it stricken from the bill without reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to strike from the bill without reading all from line 4, page 32, down to and including the word "consideration," in line 18, page 34. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, it is rather unusual to consider a bill in this way, but in view of the very large attendance here this evening, and everyone understanding the great desire to expedite the passage of the bill, I shall not object; but I trust that the chairman's desire for haste will not lead him to make similar requests too often.

Mr. PADGETT. This has all been passed as separate bills.

Mr. WALSH. Even so, I think it is bad practice.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 1570 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1570. Every seaman, landsman, or marine who performs the duty of a fireman on board any vessel of war shall be entitled to receive, in addition to his compensation as seaman, landsman, or marine, a compensation at the rate of 33 cents a day for the time he is employed as fireman."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the matter beginning with line 13, on page 35, down to and including line 20 on the same page, has already been enacted into law, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that lines 13 to 20, on page 35, both inclusive, be stricken from the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beginning at a 4 by 4 pine post, marked "U. S. L. H. E.," at the northwest angle of the United States Life Saving Station situated in section 23, township 4 south, range 19 west, in the county of Berrien and State of Michigan; thence south 54° and 30′ east 193 feet to a 4 by 4 pine post, marked "U. S. L. H. E.," at shore line; thence north 74° and 11′ east 300 feet to a 4 by 4 pine post, marked "U. S. L. H. E.," following the line of the shore; thence north 15° and 49′ west 150 feet to a 4 by 4 pine post, marked "U. S. L. H. E."; thence north 87° and 11′ west 313 feet to a 4 by 4 pine post, marked "U. S. L. H. E."; thence south 35° and 30′ west 159 feet to the place of beginning, containing approximately 1.724 acres, more or less, together with all buildings and improvements thereon, which property is shown on drawing No. 17321, bearing the legend, "Office of the Lighthouse Inspector, Twelfth District, Milwaukee, Wis. Lighthouse Depot, St. Joseph, Mich. General plan of depot. Scale as noted. Approved July 31, 1917. N. M. Works, superintendent. Lewis M. Stoddard, inspector," on file in the Navy Department.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. PADGETT. I was about to move to rise.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withhold that for a moment.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. KITCHIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10854 and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I would state to the gentleman that I went home a few days ago and delivered a speech dedicating a public building in my home town——

Mr. WALSH. I think that is worthy of preservation in the RECORD of Congress and I have no objection.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HICKS until April 28, to continue campaigning for liberty loan.

To Mr. DENISON (at the request of Mr. WILLIAMS), for two weeks, on account of speaking engagement on liberty loan.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Where is that?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is at Woodley Road and Connecticut Avenue. The operation of the tank will be under the bridge, and no badge for admission is required except the face of the Member.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 20, 1918.

The House was called to order by Mr. KITCHIN as Speaker pro tempore at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Great Spirit, in whose all-encircling love we dwell, which reflects itself in splendor from all the works of Thy hands, and which poured itself out in humble submission, in a sublime sacrifice, on the Hill of Calvary, we thank Thee that we were born and reared under the divine influences of the Christian religion; that we are citizens of the United States of America; both of which are calculated to bring out all that is purest, noblest, best, in man. The world is facing a great crisis. We are involved in it, and we most earnestly pray that we may reflect our loyalty to Thee and to the principles embodied in the Constitution of the United States, in a patriotism sublime in its sacrifices; that righteousness, liberty, truth, justice, may live, to the glory and honor of Thy holy name, in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 131. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to extend the time for the payment of annual installments on the purchase price for land in the Standing Rock Indian Reservations.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE JONES, OF VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House a communication, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

SAN JUAN, P. R., April 19.

SPEAKER HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.:

Porto Rico House takes part in mourning of Congress and Nation for death of illustrious Representative WILLIAM A. JONES, who devoted such noble thoughts and continuous labor to this country, where his memory will be always kept with gratitude.

JOS. E. DE DIEGO, Speaker.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE SULLOWAY, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. WASON rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from New Hampshire rise?

Mr. WASON. For the purpose of offering a resolution setting aside Sunday, April 28, for memorial exercises in honor of the late Representative SULLOWAY, of New Hampshire. I move the adoption of the following order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, the 28th day of April, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. CYRUS ADAMS SULLOWAY, late a Representative from the State of New Hampshire.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO THE CHARACTER OF A STATEMENT CONTAINED IN A LETTER FROM THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION AND TRANSMITTED TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES IN A REPORT MADE BY THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

Mr. CARAWAY, from the special committee appointed by the Speaker on the 11th day of April, 1918, in response to a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives to inquire into certain remarks alleged to have been included in a letter addressed to the Postmaster General by the chairman of the Committee on Public Information and by the Postmaster General transmitted to the House of Representatives on April 10, 1918, which language so complained of is as follows: "When Mr. TREADWAY stated in the House that he was 'reliably informed that there has been a very large amount of that class of mail matter sent over, and 'it is a well-known fact that great quantities of that class of matter have been placed in their hands overseas,' he made assertions the absolute baselessness of which could have been ascertained by a telephone inquiry," begs leave to make the following report:

After a careful search of the precedents, the committee finds that the House of Representatives has uniformly refused to receive and make a part of its records communications reflecting upon the House as a whole or any Member thereof.

December 14, 1842, the Speaker laid before the House a communication from S. Pleasonton, Fifth Auditor of the Treasury Department, which was as follows:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
"FIFTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
"December 14, 1842.

"SIR: In a report of a debate in the House of Representatives on Monday last, contained in the National Intelligencer of yesterday, it is stated that Mr. Sprigg, among other things, observed: 'He remembered, too, that the House at this instance had made a call upon the department (Treasury) for full and detailed information as to the whole system of managing the lighthouses of the United States, the contracts for buildings, for supplying oil, paying inspectors, etc., but no answer had ever been obtained, notwithstanding the clerks which the House had voted them and notwithstanding numerous and repeated promises made to him personally.'

"It was with extreme surprise I read this statement, as I had a perfect recollection that it was wholly erroneous; and as it is calculated, uncorrected, to injure the Treasury Department unjustly in the public estimation, I hope you and the House will excuse me for setting the Member right.

"It is sufficient to state that the whole of the information called for by the House in relation to lighthouses on Mr. Sprigg's motion was transmitted, as required by the resolution, partly to the Committee on Commerce on the 8th of March last and is contained in their printed report, No. 811, and partly to the House of Representatives direct by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 11th of March last, and by the House ordered to be printed, and will be found in Document No. 140 of the last session. These two documents contain all the information which was called for by the House.

"Mr. Sprigg individually called for the cessions of jurisdiction by the States over all the lighthouse sites, from the adoption of the Constitution; and, although so much labor and time as it required might have been declined on his individual call, yet, as I was desirous of furnishing all the information in my power to every person who sought it, the information was prepared and furnished as far as it was to be found in the office.

"I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"S. PLEASONTON.

"Hon. JOHN WHITE,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives."

The communication was by the House, after full consideration, adjudged objectionable and a resolution adopted as follows:

"Resolved, That the communication addressed to the Speaker of this House by S. Pleasonton on the 14th instant in relation to some remarks made in the House before that time by Mr. Sprigg, a Member from Kentucky, which paper was received by the Speaker and laid before the House without knowledge of its contents, was not such a communication as ought to have been received and presented to the House; that the same be withheld from the Journal and files of the House and the original be returned to the writer." (See Congressional Globe, 3d sess. 27th Cong., p. 101.)

In 1848 Mr. Medill, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, addressed the following communication to the House of Representatives:

"To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States:

"During the debate which took place in the House of Representatives on an amendment made by the Senate to the civil and diplomatic bill allowing to David Taylor the sum of $12,800 for a certain reservation claimed by him under the treaties of 1817 and 1835 with the Cherokees, as reported in the National Intelligencer of this morning, I find the following, viz:

"'Mr. Clingman supported the claim and took occasion to warn the committee against any opposition which might have been made to it by Mr. Medill, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who, he understood, had endeavored to prejudice the claim because the agents of the claimant peremptorily refused to make an allowance for his favoring the claim. Mr. C. denounced the Indian Bureau as thoroughly corrupt. He had been credibly informed that the books in that bureau had been altered and falsified for corrupt purposes (though this, he believed, had been done during the incumbency of Mr. Crawford, the predecessor of the present commissioner). He had no confidence in Mr. Medill, nor would he believe any statement he should make. An application had been made to the department to have the books taken out of his office and deposited in some place where they would be safe from alterations.'

"It is seldom that a public officer is justified in noticing attacks of this kind, but the above charges are of so grave and specific a character and so seriously reflect not only upon myself, personally and officially, but upon the administration of the whole of that branch of the public service intrusted to my charge that a different course on this occasion seems to be called for."

The House on the same day it was read adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the communication of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be returned to that officer, and that he be informed that this House considers the language thereof as offensive and indecorous."

This appears in a report of the second session of the Thirtieth Congress, date August 12, 1848, page 1070 of the Congressional Globe.

On the 3d day of February, 1865, the Senate adopted a resolution requesting the Secretary of the Navy for certain information. In answer to the resolution the Secretary of the Navy transmitted a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy in which the Assistant Secretary undertook to reply to a speech that had before that time been made by Senator Hale on the floor of the Senate. This communication from the Secretary of the Navy was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate for its consideration. On March 4, 1865, the committee reported as follows:

"The only information that the Secretary was instructed to give was in relation to the particular matters mentioned in the resolution. What may have been said by Senators, while it was under consideration, was not submitted to him either for approval or censure, nor was he called upon or authorized to vindicate himself or any person in his department from allegations made or supposed to have been made in the Senate. However, the person supposing himself assailed is not without redress; he may appeal to the public judgment through the press or request the Senate to constitute a committee of inquiry as to the truth of the charges; but there exists no right in an officer of the Government, in answer to specific inquiries, to comment on the debates of the body nor to vindicate his conduct, either individually or officially, in any matters not called for in the inquiries of the Senate. If differences exist between any member of the Senate and a citizen not a member, it is not the proper province of the body to settle them. Their duties are limited to matters proper for legislation or to such as refer to the public good and require investigation.

"With these views it is the opinion of your committee that the letter of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, as accompanying the communication of the Secretary, should not have been sent to the Senate by the latter officer:

"1. Because the first part of it does not profess to relate to the Senate resolution but to be in response to the allegations of Hon. John P. Hale against the writer.

"2. Because the remainder of it merely gives a history of his conduct in attempting to relieve the garrison of Fort Sumter in 1861, an attempt worthy of praise, but which has not the most remote connection with a single inquiry embraced by the resolution.

"The committee therefore recommend the adoption of this resolution:

"'Resolved, That the letter to the Secretary of the Navy from the Assistant Secretary should not have been communicated in answer to the Senate resolution of February 3, 1865, and that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to return the same to the Secretary of the Navy.'"

The resolution was adopted and the communication returned to the Secretary of the Navy.

These proceedings are reported in the second session of the Thirty-eighth Congress on page 1365 of the Congressional Globe.

The House likewise refused to receive a message of Mr. Roosevelt, then President of the United States, in which there were statements calculated to reflect upon Members of Congress, and adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the House in the exercise of its constitutional prerogatives declines to consider any communication from any source which is not in its own judgment respectful; and be it further

"Resolved, That the special committee and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from any consideration of so much of the President's annual message as relates to the Secret Service and is above set forth, and that the said portion of the message be laid on the table."

The language contained in the communication to the Postmaster General and attributed to the chairman of the Committee on Public Information is, in the opinion of the committee, impertinent and not respectful. In the language of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in the Hale case, "there exists no right in an employee of the Government in answer to specific inquiries to comment on the debates of the body nor to vindicate his conduct, either individually or officially, in any matters not called for in the inquiries."

With these views it is the opinion of this committee that the letter of the chairman of the Committee on Public Information should not be received by the House. Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to respectfully return the communication containing the same to the Postmaster General.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the report is unanimous and full, and the members of the committee are desirous this morning not to interfere with the present consideration of the naval appropriation bill, unless some member of the special committee wants to be heard, I want to move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas moves the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I notice a slight typographical error in the reading by the Clerk of a citation, and inasmuch as the Members may want to look at this some time, I want to call the attention of the Clerk to it. The Congressional Globe citation was given as on page 1070. That citation, as I recall distinctly, is page 1170. I have just sent for the Globe to verify that, but I am certain that is correct.

Mr. CARAWAY. If it is an error, it can be corrected. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that if it turns out to be an error it may be corrected by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CARAWAY. I move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the report.

The question was taken, and the report was unanimously adopted.

SABOTAGE.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURRIE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in addressing the House last Monday on the so-called sabotage bill reference was made to a letter from the Attorney General of the United States. This letter sought, among other things, to justify the Department of Justice upon its conduct in handling cases of sabotage, sedition, and other acts of disloyalty. The letter was quite lengthy, and was given by the Department of Justice to the press, and at my request was also inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Attorney General contended mainly that the fault did not lie with the Department of Justice, but rather that it was handicapped by reason of needed legislation. I have a letter from the American Defense Society, which has among its officers and upon its board of trustees some of the most prominent people in the country and has as its honorary president a former President of the United States, Theodore Roosevelt; and in this letter a pointed criticism is made of some statements of the Attorney General, and several of them are challenged. The subject matter is of such vast interest and importance to the American people that the country should know what this letter contains. I therefore ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks so that that letter may be incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

AMERICAN DEFENSE SOCIETY, INC.,
New York, April 17, 1918.

Hon. GILBERT A. CURRIE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The public press contains to-day what purports to be the full text of a letter to yourself from the Attorney General of the United States, in answer to a letter of yours to the Department of Justice under date of the 2d instant. The Attorney General's letter, treated at large, appears to be a defense of the procedure during war of the Department of Justice in the performance of its duties and a plea for further legislation. You will, of course, not misunderstand this letter as opposing in any wise any legislation aimed at the suppression of treason, sedition, insurrection, or disloyalty in any form. On the contrary, this society has unqualifiedly taken the position that whatever legislation may be necessary to strengthen the hands of the Government in relation to all such matters should be passed with the utmost promptness. The particular statutes which may be proposed to Congress for its consideration and action must, of course, be scrutinized, lest through the language employed and the detailed recital of particular acts (which is always an error in all criminal legislation) they should be capable of some other application than their intended loyal purpose; lest they be made a vehicle of partisanship; lest they be deturned from the defense of the land to the defense of some Governmental underling; lest they be utilized to suppress the pitiless publicity intended in the phrase denominating eternal vigilance to be the price of liberty.

The object of this letter is to call to your attention and freely and openly to criticize certain of the expressions contained in the letter referred to; and since full publicity has been given to that letter, it is requested that equal publicity be given hereto. The letter says that if a strong feeling exists throughout the country that the Government authorities (meaning the Department of Justice) are dealing too leniently with spies and dangerous enemies within the United States, that feeling is mainly caused by the lack of Federal statutes. This is error. The general public feeling which the letter recognizes as existing has been caused in part by the action which has been taken and in part by lack of action by the Department of Justice. The letter is also in error in saying that the Department of Justice has vigorously prosecuted every case of enemy activity of which it has acquired information, for the phrase vigorously prosecuted implies an attempt to enforce the full vigor of existing law, and, so far as known, there have been no prosecutions under the constitutional provision and the Federal statute defining treason, except in the cases of the prosecution of the editors of a German newspaper for editorial articles and an apparently unwarranted prosecution here in New York, both of which cases failed through the court declining to send them to the jury on the ground that the proofs were not sufficient to constitute the crime charged.

Action intended to impede and pro tanto prevent the raising of armies to defend the land are acts of treason if done by one who, for any reason whatsoever, desires that the enemy should prevail, and the question whether such desire be or be not present on the part of the given individual is a question for the jury. So, also, acts done with the intent to diminish the warlike resources of the land—blowing up munition factories, destroying vessels or food supplies—though in such cases the intent with which the act was done and the desire that the enemy should prevail practically demonstrate themselves by the mere commission of the act. The department has not prosecuted for treason, though the whole world (rightly or wrongly) estimates that treason has been committed here abundantly. Continuing, the letter says: "The stories that dangerous spies have been paroled by this department from internment camps are unqualifiedly false in every particular." This is not ingenuous. So far as known no responsible statement to that effect has been made. Statement, however, has been made that dangerous alien enemies have been paroled from internment camps, and this is not denied.

It will be noted that in that paragraph of the letter there is a "juggling" of the two phrases. First, it is denied that "spies" have been paroled, and the letter then states that "as rapidly as really dangerous alien enemies have come to the attention of Government officers they have been apprehended and interned." The impression created on the mind of the hasty reader is that statements made as to the release from internment of dangerous "alien enemies" have been false, whereas in fact those statements are really not denied. Under public clamor those powerful "dangerous anemy aliens" who were released have now been reinterned. But that was only brought about by great and publicly expressed criticism and disapproval of the acts of the department in that respect.

The letter also says that "as a matter of policy the action by the department in interning enemy aliens has also been done, so far as possible, without publicity."

If this be true, it is a grave mistake of policy. Internment of a "dangerous" alien enemy (to adopt the Attorney General's erroneous limitation) can have but two objects—to restrain the individual's activities and to deter others—for if internment be only for "dangerous" alien enemies, it falls within the category of punishment, and those are the recognized reasons for all punishment; are, indeed, its only justification. Why, then, should the mistaken policy be pursued of suppressing publicity as to such internments? The mistake is such an one as to raise a doubt of the equipment of the department to perform its functions. It is time that an official statement be made detailing the total number of dangerous enemy aliens who have been interned; the total number of those who have at any time been released; the total number of those who having been released have been reinterned; the total number of those who have been a second time released; and the total number of those who are now in the internment camps.

Similar criticisms apply to the succeeding phrase of the letter: "It is stated that on the night of the declaration of war all the German agents then known to it (the department) were immediately transferred to war prison camps—the number of enemies for obvious reasons being kept secret."

The only obvious reason for such suppression would be that so few German agents were known to the department that it would be an encouragement to the others to continue if the facts were made public.

Later in the letter it is said that the department has "carried out successfully a registration of all male German alien enemies." Without undertaking to vouch for the number, your attention is called to the fact that it has been repeatedly openly stated by the public press that in the city of New York from 20,000 to 32,000 male German alien enemies remain to-day unregistered.

The letter also contains the following phrase "there is as yet no Federal statute except the treason statute (which is unworkable for this purpose) under which the Government can prosecute men who attempt to destroy factories, munitions, and other stores necessary for our armies." No reason is given to sustain the proposition that the treason statute is unworkable for the purpose of punishing those who attempt to destroy factories, munitions, and stores necessary for the Army, and the bald statement in this respect is not correct. The treason statute applies, and since the punishment provided by the treason statute is left to the discretion of the court, to be placed at from 10 years imprisonment and $10,000 fine up to death, there is every reason why the treason statute should be enforced. There would appear to be a fear lest a jury having convicted, the court would in some case or cases assess the penalty at death. If so, it represents a curious frame of mind where the officers of the law fail to recognize that the destruction of munition factories will cause the loss of the lives of loyal American citizens on the battle field, or if they do recognize this fact hesitate to attempt to prevent such destruction by the condemning of some few "traitors" to death. The human weakness, that what is unseen or not right at hand can not be visualized, would seem to be here apparent. The indirect effect—the death of loyal American soldiers on the battle field—does not impress the mind sufficiently to prevent its shrinking in horror from the idea of inflicting the death penalty on the person who has treacherously caused the deaths of the soldiers. As has been recently said in the public prints, "It is impossible to say that John Smith was killed in France because of some particular act in the United States, yet nevertheless the harvest of sedition is reaped on the battle field." The treason statute applies to all these cases. As to the demand for further legislation, it will be noted that so far as reasonable facts are recited therein, the effect of such legislation is that on the passage of statutes which recite treasonable acts and then award for them penalties excluding any possibility of the application of the death penalty, individuals committing treason will be prosecuted not under the treason statute but under the statute reciting the particular offense. If convicted they will be condemned to terms of imprisonment and after peace is declared these murderers may at least reasonably hope to be released. The letter near its close states that "the Federal Government is impotent to suppress industrial treason." That statement should be immediately refuted. It is quite incorrect. That it should be publicly proclaimed is not to be commended if it were correct. Appearing on the authority of its source it calls for a clear statement of its not only being incorrect but also of how it comes to appear. A virile department does not need the reinforcement of statutes reciting specific acts as constituting crimes, where such acts fall within the definition of an already existing general class. These would appear to be the reasons for the appearance of that unwarranted statement.

The complaint of the United States of America against the Department of Justice is that it seems to be inherently weak.

Yours, respectfully,

AMERICAN DEFENSE SOCIETY,
By CHAS. STEWART DAVISON,
Member, Board of Trustees.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague, Mr. SUMNERS, be excused indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the pending naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUMPHREYS rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Mississippi rise?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing, at the request of the petitioners, a petition relating to second-class mail matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a petition concerning second-class mail matter. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10854, the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10854, the naval appropriation bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10854, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, before that is done I want to offer an amendment following line 17 on page 38. It is a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Committee amendment: Page 38, after line 17, insert:

"(a) That the word 'person' as used in paragraphs (b), (c), next hereafter shall include any individual, trustee, firm, association, company, or corporation. The word 'ship' shall include any boat, vessel, submarine, or any form of aircraft, and the parts thereof. The words 'war material' shall include arms, armament, ammunition, stores, supplies, and equipment for ships and airplanes, and everything required for or in connection with the production thereof. The word 'factory' shall include any factory, workshop, engine works, building used for manufacture, assembling, construction, or any process, and any shipyard or dock yard. The words 'United States' shall include the Canal Zone and all territory and waters, continental and insular, subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

"(b) The President is hereby authorized and empowered, within the limits of the amounts appropriated therefor:

"First. To place an order with any person for such ships or war material as the necessities of the Government, to be determined by the President, may require and which are of the nature, kind, and quantity usually produced or capable of being produced by such person. Compliance with all such orders shall be obligatory on any person to whom such order is given, and such order shall take precedence over all other orders and contracts theretofore placed with such person. If any person owning, leasing, or operating any factory equipped for the building or production of ships or war material for the Navy shall refuse or fail to give to the United States such preference in the execution of such an order, or shall refuse to build, supply, furnish, or manufacture the kind, quantity, or quality of ships or war material so ordered at such reasonable price as shall be determined by the President, the President may take immediate possession of any factory of such person, or of any part thereof without taking possession of the entire factory, and may use the same at such times and in such manner as he may consider necessary or expedient.

"Second. Within the limit of the amounts appropriated therefor, to modify or cancel any existing contract for the building, production, or purchase of ships or war material; and if any contractor shall refuse or fail to comply with the contract as so modified, the President may take immediate possession of any factory of such contractor, or any part thereof without taking possession of the entire factory, and may use the same at such times and in such manner as he may consider necessary or expedient.

"Third. To require the owner or occupier of any factory in which ships or war material are built or produced to place at the disposal of the United States the whole or any part of the output of such factory, and within the limit of the amounts appropriated therefor, to deliver such output or parts thereof in such quantities and at such times as may be specified in the order at such reasonable price as shall be determined by the President.

"Fourth. To requisition and take over for use or operation by the Government any factory, or any part thereof without taking possession of the entire factory, whether the United States has or has not any contract with the owner or occupier of such factory.

"That all authority granted to the President herein or by him delegated shall cease six months after a final treaty of peace shall be proclaimed between this Government and the German Empire.

"(d) That whenever the United States shall cancel or modify any contract, make use of, assume, occupy, requisition, or take over any factory or part thereof, or any ships or war material, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph (b), it shall make just compensation therefor, to be determined by the President, and if the amount thereof so determined by the President is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 50 per cent of the amount so determined by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to said 50 per cent shall make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code."

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania reserves a point of order. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, this is a committee amendment and is identical with what I think is existing law. In the act of March 3, 1917, the naval appropriation bill, this legislation was enacted, but there was this provision, that in time of war or of national emergency arising prior to March 1, 1918, to be determined by the President by proclamation, the President is hereby authorized and empowered, in addition to all other existing provisions of law, to do certain things, which is just the very language used there. Now, there was this amendment that was put on, that all authority granted to the President in this paragraph to be exercised in time of national emergency shall cease on March 1, 1918.

Mr. BUTLER. That is what is known as the Lenroot amendment?

Mr. PADGETT. That is the Lenroot amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Perhaps I may be able to avoid the necessity of asking for a long explanation, if the gentleman will tell me just wherein the change is to be made.

Mr. PADGETT. That will take only a moment. It says here in time of war or national emergency arising prior to March 1, 1918.

Now, that language is changed so it says the President is authorized to do these things. The language is identical. Then this part of it here, that all authority granted to the President in this paragraph be exercised in time of national emergency shall cease on March 1, 1918, is stricken out, and in lieu of it is inserted that all authority granted herein shall cease within six months after the termination of the war. The other is the identical language.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the only change proposed?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment, giving the President authority to take over the Cape May air station site without having to wait for the purchase of it.

Mr. BUTLER. Is this offered as an amendment to the former amendment, or is it a separate paragraph on a separate subject entirely?

Mr. PADGETT. This is a separate paragraph, following the other. It is an amendment to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment to follow the amendment just adopted: "That the act approved October 6, 1917, to provide for the acquisition of an air-station site for the United States Navy at Cape May, N. J., be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding the following at the end thereof:

"And provided further, That in the event the Secretary of the Navy is unable to satisfactorily consummate the negotiations for the purchase thereof under the provisions of said act approved October 6, 1917, the President is hereby authorized and empowered to take over for and in behalf of the United States the immediate possession of and title to such land, including all easements, rights of way, riparian and other rights appurtenant or appertaining thereto deemed by him to be necessary for the purposes aforesaid, and to make compensation therefor under the terms and provisions of the legislation contained in this act; and the appropriation of $150,000 appropriated in said act approved October 6, 1917, or so much thereof as may be necessary is hereby made available for the payment of compensation for said property so taken over by the President."

Mr. BUTLER. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. It is a committee amendment and was unanimous. On October 6 last an act was passed authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to purchase certain land at Cape May, N. J., and an appropriation was made of $150,000 to pay for it under the purchase. The Secretary of the Navy has not been able to negotiate a satisfactory purchase, believing that the owners are asking more for the land than it is worth. Not being able satisfactorily to arrange a purchase, this is simply to give the President power to take it over for the United States under the same provision that Congress has passed time and again, and as we have just adopted in this bill, and pay for it out of the appropriation that was made for its purchase. That is all the amendment does.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Has the chairman any further amendment to offer to this amendment?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. BUTLER. This amendment will stand alone so far as the chairman is concerned?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me see if I am right. This is purely legislation and would be out of order if any one made the point of order. If it should remain in the bill, it might be amended by another amendment out of order, might it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair ordinarily would not cross a bridge until he gets to it, but if there is a proposition in an appropriation bill which is out of order, and it is allowed to remain without the point of order being made against it, any germane amendment to that would be in order, but no affirmative new legislation would be in order upon it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I renew the reservation of the point of order.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, did we not give the President in that bill power to condemn that land?

Mr. PADGETT. No. That was the bill that authorized the purchase and made an appropriation of $150,000 for its purchase. The owners are asking more for it than it is thought to be worth, and, in order to get a fair price for it, this is simply to authorize the President to take it over in the event they can not arrange a satisfactory purchase. There is no additional money appropriated. It only authorizes the use of the $150,000 appropriated for its purchase for the payment for it under this condemnation.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I trust no one will object to this amendment. It is my impression that when we gave the right to purchase that land we also gave the right to condemn it in case they would not arrange upon a price. I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will not make the point of order. It is necessary legislation.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment? I think we have a general law which provides for the condemnation of property.

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. FOSS. Where they can not come to a reasonable price agreement.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know of any such general law. The law generally authorizes the President to take certain things "herein" or "hereby" authorized, or limitations of that kind.

Mr. FOSS. I may be mistaken, but I thought we had a general law upon the subject.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does the amendment simply proceed to exercise the principle of eminent domain?

Mr. PADGETT. That is all.

Mr. FESS. So that the owner will get what is a reasonable price for his property under the condemnation proceedings?

Mr. PADGETT. It is not a condemnation.

Mr. FESS. It operates in the same way.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. It is simply giving the President power to condemn it under the legislation we have enacted time and again, and pay for it out of the appropriation that was made for its purchase.

Mr. FESS. In the gentleman's opinion, would the Government suffer if this proceeding could not be consummated?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. It was represented at the time as being a very urgent and necessary matter, and the Congress passed it with that idea and for that purpose. It was then understood that we should purchase, but after Congress authorized the purchase of it, the owner wanted to raise the price, and this is simply to authorize the President to take it over and pay for it as we have done in other things, and make available the money that was appropriated for its purchase to pay for it under the condemnation.

Mr. FESS. Then the gentleman's opinion is that when the owner understood that the Government needed it and was ready to buy it he simply put his price up?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I should think we will be justified in this proceeding.

Mr. PADGETT. The Secretary says that he can not get a reasonable purchase price.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would like to inquire of the chairman whether or not the Government is now occupying this land under lease?

Mr. PADGETT. I think so; that is my recollection.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And whether or not we have a good many thousand dollars of investment there?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not remember the amount, but there was some investment put there. We had that matter up under discussion in October.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. So that it becomes necessary to purchase this at a reasonable figure, or else lose the investment the Government already has?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and the Government needs it. This is simply allowing the Government to take it over under condemnation, because the owners will not offer it at a reasonable price.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. This permits the President to pay to the owners 75 per centum of what is thought to be a reasonable price?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and allows the owner to go into court and sue for whatever he may think is the balance due of the purchase price.

Mr. WALSH. And the $150,000 which is appropriated, as carried in the amendment, of course, does not limit the total price of the property to that sum?

Mr. PADGETT. It does not, and Congress has no authority to limit it; it could not limit it.

Mr. WALSH. What I mean is the gentleman does not mean to contend that, because the people who own the property want more than the Government is willing to pay, if this amendment is adopted, the amount which the owners will eventually get will not be in excess of the sum carried in the amendment?

Mr. PADGETT. Not at all; because the Congress has not the power to do that. The owner has the right to go into court and have his property valued.

Mr. WALSH. Is not this the same property that was stated here in discussion of the amendment or the bill providing for its purchase that it was thought that arrangements had been made for its purchase at a price agreed upon?

Mr. PADGETT. It was understood and represented to us that it could be purchased within the $150,000.

Mr. WALSH. And the increase in what the owners want, of course, is not due to any fault on the part of the Government?

Mr. PADGETT. None of which I know.

Mr. WALSH. It is simply——

Mr. PADGETT. I think it is one of those cases where they think that the Government needs a thing and has arranged to get it and it is like improving armed live stock by running a mogul engine over one of them.

Mr. BROWNING. I will state to the gentleman there were two owners at that time, but since we have made the agreement for $150,000 it has passed back to the original owner, and it is the original owner now that is holding us up.

Mr. TALBOTT. And he has the idea that the whole $150,000 was appropriated to buy the land.

Mr. WALSH. He is apparently stricken with the profiteering fever in its most fatal form. I am going to withdraw the point of order, and I hope this matter will be pressed to its speedy conclusion under condemnation proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the point of order.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new paragraph after the word "department," line 17, page 38, "hereafter when dismissed from the service every enlisted man in the Navy shall be given an honorable discharge, except in cases where punishment has been inflicted by order of a court-martial."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the gentleman going to make a point of order against it? I think this ought to be given consideration.

Mr. PADGETT. For instance, it says that every man shall be given an honorable discharge.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. There are honorable discharges and there are ordinary discharges. A man may not be entitled to an honorable discharge, but might be entitled to an ordinary discharge or a good discharge, or maybe a bad discharge.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Or to a discharge as being undesirable.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will reserve the point of order for 15 minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. I will reserve the point of order for discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the introduction of this amendment, which I concede to be subject to the point of order under the rule, is that recently there has come to my attention action on the part of the Navy Department which is unjustified by one man as against another, and especially unjustified by the Government against one of its citizens, and particularly unjustified by the Government against any man who is enlisted in its service to defend the flag. In the case of a young man named Kennedy, whose mother lives at 58 East Thirty-sixth Place, Chicago, a widow, by the way, whose only support was this son, this boy was discharged from the Navy after having given considerable of his time to the service of his country in trips across the water into the war zone, and his discharge was entitled a discharge of inaptitude. Now, I do not know what they mean by "inaptitude," except that a man may not be able to function in connection with the work he is called upon to discharge. The fact that he is not able to function on account of ill health or for some other reasons ought not, in my judgment, to justify the Navy Department in discharging him from the service and turning him loose upon the streets, as if he had no country. In the case of this particular boy, he was ill and needed medical service, and I appealed to Admiral Benson, who is in command of the Bureau of Navigation——

Mr. PADGETT. Naval Operations.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, Naval Operations; and I asked for his admission to a hospital, at the request of his mother, and I was told that because he was discharged for inaptitude he was not eligible for admission to the hospital. Now, I think that is inhumane on the part of the Government. The boy is still sick, sick almost unto death. He was left to find his way back from the port of discharge as best he knew how.

No one in the Government paid any attention to the fact that he was sick. No one gave any consideration to the fact that he was the son of a widowed mother. No one paid any attention to the fact that he had volunteered to serve his country and that in the service of the country he had lost his health, and because he lost his health the man in command of the ship, who gave no consideration whatever to the boy from a humanitarian side of the case, turned him loose to die, if need be, without friends a thousand miles away from home, and the purpose of the introduction of this amendment to this bill at this time is further to emphasize my objection to the attitude of the commanders of American ships of the Navy toward the men. The time has come when every American should insist that the American boy who offers his life to his country should be treated as an American and not as an outcast. [Applause.]

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I will yield.

Mr. VENABLE. The gentleman stated this boy was discharged because of inaptitude?

Mr. MADDEN. That is what they said; I do not know.

Mr. VENABLE. Has the gentleman any information or has he sought to get any information as to what this inaptitude is?

Mr. MADDEN. No; except that he was nervous and could not function, which was caused entirely from his sickness, as I learned from his mother, and because a man happens to be sick and could not function——

Mr. VENABLE. Has the gentleman taken——

Mr. MADDEN. Wait a minute until I answer this question. There is no reason why the Government should turn him adrift. He would function if he could. He committed no crime. He is an honest boy. He has a clean record. His moral character is as high as that of any other boy in America. I protest against this kind of treatment toward the boys of America who enlist in the Navy.

Mr. SLAYDEN and Mr. VENABLE rose.

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VENABLE. Has the gentleman inquired of the Navy Department as to what they have to say about it?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. That is why I am talking. I can get no satisfaction there. They say he is not eligible to admission to a hospital because the charge against him is inaptitude.

Mr. VENABLE. Does the gentleman say that was all they had to say about it?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. They said he was sick and could not function, and because he was sick and could not function they turned him adrift and did not consider him as worth anything but driftwood.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the remarks just made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] and was also interested in his statement made yesterday, which will be found on pages 5347 and 5348 of the RECORD, and the statement in which the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs offered to investigate and look after these cases.

I desire to call the attention of Members to a distressing case of a discharged boy. I ask you to put yourselves in the position of an 18-year-old boy discharged from a ship 4,000 miles away from home, without a cent, without car fare, without proper clothing. The discharge papers given in this case state that he is discharged for undesirability. His letter is dated June, 1917, and soon after that I inquired into his case at the department, have continued to inquire, and am still waiting for information. I read:

PENSACOLA RED CROSS FOR ARMY AND NAVY,
Pensacola, Fla., June 30, 1917.

DEAR MOTHER: I drop you a line to tell you I am in the Navy no longer. I was given an undesirable discharge for some reason, which they will not tell me. They put me on shore without a cent and did not give me car fare. I had been doing as I was told, and was obeying all orders the best I knew how. There were eight of us, and none of us knew why we were being discharged. I will work here to get enough money to take me to New Orleans, and from there I shall ship on a steamer to San Francisco, and will try to work my way to Portland, Oreg., and home.

With lots of love,
GEO. MEDLOCK.

Now, that boy was left as a tramp 4,000 miles away from home, 18 years old, without a car ticket. Let me tell you a little more about it. When I received the letter of protest I sent a letter down to the Personnel Division of the Navy and received a form letter, to which had been added the words that this boy was discharged because he was "undesirable and dirty." That is what gave him the undesirable discharge—dirty.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Then he was not sick?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The statement was that he was discharged because he was "undesirable and dirty." I was ashamed to send that letter to the boy's mother, who has another boy now in Uncle Sam's service. I went down personally to the department, and I am glad to say, for the honor of the department, that they all denied responsibility for that letter. The officer signing it said he did not read it. An investigation of the use of the word "dirty" showed that this boy had been sent all the way down the Pacific coast, through the Panama Canal, and up to Pensacola; that he had developed an extreme case of dysentery, in consequence of which he had lost 40 pounds. He was unable to keep his clothes clean.

I do not want to make any charges against any commander in this time of distress, but such cases must not be. I have a letter here, under date of September 24, from Capt. Senn, Acting Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, September 24, 1917.

Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR JOHNSON: I have received your letter of September 19, 1917, referring further to the discharge as undesirable of George C. Medlock.

In the stress of current work it was not noted that the commanding officer of the ——— has not made reply to the bureau's inquiry in connection with the discharge of Medlock and certain others. The ——— has been engaged in very important work, and it may be possible that the commanding officer has had no opportunity to make the full investigation on the report requested by the bureau.

I believe it was stated when you called in person at the bureau that it was evident the commanding officer had erred; and when the bureau learned of all the facts it did the best it could under the circumstances in endeavoring to find Medlock in New Orleans with a view to his reenlistment and transfer to the west coast with a view to bringing him near his home. As you may recall, however, Medlock had already left New Orleans.

You ask in your communication if it will be necessary to secure certificates from physicians as to his condition. The bureau sees no good which could result from securing evidence of this kind, as the fact remains he was discharged, and physicians' statements would do no good unless possibly the parents have in mind a claim for pension, which should, however, be addressed to the Commissioner of Pensions at Washington, D. C.

As soon as the report is received from the commanding officer of the ——— you will be advised.

Very respectfully,
THOS. J. SENN,
Captain, United States Navy, Acting Chief of Bureau.

They admit a mistake, but the correction is slow in forthcoming. A little later I was asked to take no further steps, and as soon as the bureau was able to communicate with the commanding officer I was promised that I would be informed. I then took no steps until in March of this year, when I called attention to the matter, and I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, to which I have had no reply as yet. I feel justified in calling upon the distinguished chairman of this committee and all the members of the committee to insist on finding out if the United States proposes, at the very time it hangs posters on billboards all over the country appealing to the boys to join the Navy, through the failure of action on the part of its Congress, its House of Representatives and its Senate, to permit officers to set boys ashore, either because they are undesirable or for any other reason for discharge except crime, and leave them as tramps far away from home. It is unjust.

Mr. MADDEN. And especially when they are sick.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; especially when they are sick. This boy when he got home had lost 70 pounds. We found him through the aid of the police of New Orleans and took him home as a sick boy, and he is now anxious to enlist again in the Navy.

Now, I appeal to Members of this House that that can not go on. If an amendment to the law is needed, we should have it, or a special law, perhaps.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. In the case of the boy I referred to, I begged them to admit him to a hospital for treatment, and they said he was not admissible because he had an inaptitude discharge.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; and in addition to inhumanity of the act, I submit that it was unfair to the community at Pensacola to turn these boys loose—seven or eight penniless boys—as tramps, and start them possibly on careers as tramps or hoboes or even I. W. W.'s. It is not fair to the community. It is an outrage against patriotic boys who in good faith joined the Navy in order to serve their country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I know nothing whatever of the merits of these matters or the demerits of them. Yesterday, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] was addressing the House, I tried as earnestly as I could and as politely as I knew how to ascertain from him such information as would enable me to investigate the matter.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course, I have no complaint to make about the gentleman from Tennessee. I was not complaining about him, I was complaining about the Navy Department, and it was to them that I was addressing my remarks.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. This morning I went to see Admiral Benson, Chief of Operations, and I called attention to the statement in the RECORD of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. The admiral said to me that he could not understand why there should be any such treatment or how such a thing as that had happened; that if it had happened it was wrong; and that it would be taken up for investigation, and if the officers had violated their duty they would be called to account.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for one more interruption?

Mr. PADGETT. In just a moment. The law provides that upon discharge a man shall be given a ticket to the place of original enlistment, and they also furnish him a civilian suit of clothes; and the admiral stated that he did not know anything about this, but that he would have it fully and thoroughly investigated, and stated that the letter of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] with the papers had been forwarded for the purpose of getting the facts, and that he would report as soon as he could get them.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to say to the gentleman that there have been two sets of letters sent to the department, but only one reply; and if they are so solicitous about doing the right thing, why did they not do it when I called their attention to the facts, instead of waiting for the chairman of the Naval Committee?

Mr. PADGETT. They had already sent the gentleman's letter on for investigation, and stated that they could not show me the papers this morning because they had sent them on to the place to get reports as to the matter.

I knew nothing and heard nothing of the matter mentioned by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] until he mentioned it to me this morning, and I said to him that I would try to do all I could to investigate the matter, and if there was any such practice or any such omission that it should be called to the attention of the department and proper redress made.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to say that they must have known the facts, because they answered the first letter which I wrote, saying that the boy was discharged for inaptitude, so that he could not be admitted to the hospital because of that character of discharge.

Mr. PADGETT. He could not be admitted to the hospital, because a man who is not in the service can not be admitted; and whenever he was discharged from the service he lost that right, whether he had an honorable discharge, a dishonorable discharge, or any other kind of a discharge. He could not be admitted to the hospital after his discharge, because the hospital is for the men in the service. That answers the question about not getting into the hospital.

Mr. MADDEN. That was not the tenor of the answer that they made to me, however.

Mr. PADGETT. That is it, that he was discharged, and therefore could not be admitted to the hospital.

Mr. MADDEN. That he was discharged for inaptitude, and that made him ineligible.

Mr. PADGETT. "Inaptitude" was the cause of his discharge.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want it understood that I am making no assault upon the Navy or upon this committee. I do ask for an investigation. I ask that officers who are setting these boys ashore without money be punished. I have waited in the case of Medlock many months—as long as anyone could reasonably expect me to wait—in the hope of action by the Navy Department. The chairman says clothing is given to these boys discharged as undesirable. Well, this Medlock boy seems to have been given one shirt and a pair of overalls and set ashore.

Mr. PADGETT. I know the gentleman stated that, and I want to say——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me get this into the RECORD. This is the statement of the banker who sent the money to New Orleans from Kelso, Wash., for the purpose of finding him and paying his railroad fare on the rest of his long trip to the north Pacific coast. I read:

KELSO STATE BANK,
Kelso, Wash., July 17, 1917.

Hon. ALBERT JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.:

I have your letter of July 12 in reference to the little Medlock boy. We have apparently located him and are wiring him funds and a ticket to come home from New Orleans. We will get the details from him promptly upon his return. It seems incomprehensible to us here that our Army and naval officers would take young boys like this into the Army or Navy, taking them away from their homes and as far away as Pensacola, Fla., is from Kelso, and then turn them loose on some petty excuse absolutely without even car fare to get to the city. This boy is a good boy here. He writes that he obeyed all orders given him, was doing the best he could, and supposed he was giving complete satisfaction, and without any notice of any kind he and seven others were dumped ashore with a paper stating that they were undesirable and discharged from the Navy, having no money and no clothing, except, I believe, he said in his letter, an old shirt and pair of overalls, and turned loose. This community is very patriotic, and we have sent in the neighborhood of 60 boys to the Army, Navy, and into the marines, and it has been a great consolation to the parents to feel that they would be properly treated by their officers. * * *

Respectfully, yours,
F. L. STEWART.

Mr. Stewart also writes, under date of July 30, 1917, as follows:

Again referring to the matter of the discharge of George Medlock, I am inclosing his discharge herewith, which he desires to have returned to me for him. Medlock tells me that he obeyed all orders and did everything required of him; that he bathed three times a week and went swimming off the ship every day, kept his uniform and equipment in perfect order, and was up until the morning of June 30, so far as he knew, giving perfect satisfaction. At that time an officer picked him out from amongst other boys and ordered him to go to the office, and there were seven other boys picked out and given the same instructions. At one office on the ship they were sent to another, and when they were sent through they were equipped with discharges like the one we are sending to you. The stripes were ripped off their uniforms and they were put ashore without any money, even being told that they could not get their money. Little George himself, for instance, was drawing $34 per month, receiving same twice a month, and sending part of it back to his parents, who are very poor. He tells us that every two weeks a board was put up where all could see it, showing exactly the amount due each one, and that he could draw it or leave it over to his credit, as he wished. In his case he generally drew his money and sent it home. He figures he has $17 coming to him, but the discharge shows that he owes the Government $33.46.

I think I reflect the sentiment of everyone in Kelso in saying that we would like to have the matter looked up. Patriotism is strong here, but the people want justice also. * * *

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know about the facts, but if any wrong has been done it ought to be corrected, and they said they would look into it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In March of this year I made a statement on the floor about this case, which was printed in several western daily newspapers, particularly in California, and I beg to say to the gentleman from Tennessee that that publication brought to me, from writers unknown to me, dozens of letters telling of other similar cases, showing that this practice has been going on. I wrote a personal letter to the Secretary of the Navy in March, to which there has been no reply, but I am sure one will be forthcoming. I know the Secretary to be a man with a great heart and a just man. If the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs can assist in straightening this out and in stopping the practice, even if he has to introduce and pass a special act, he will be doing justice to the boys of this country, to their parents, to the country, and for the honor and dignity of the Navy. [Applause.]

Mr. PADGETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. As the point of order is conceded, that disposes of the amendment. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordnance and ordnance stores: For procuring, producing, preserving, and handling ordnance material; for the armament of ships; for fuel, material, and labor to be used in the general work of the Ordnance Department; for furniture at naval ammunition depots, torpedo stations, and proving grounds; for necessary improvements at and maintenance of proving grounds, powder factory, torpedo stations, gun factory, ammunition depots, and armor and projectile plant, and for target practice; for the maintenance, repair, or operation of horse-drawn and motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, to be used only for official purposes at naval ammunition depots, naval proving grounds, and naval torpedo stations, and for pay of chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, and naval ammunition depots: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, watchmen, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, and naval ammunition depots for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, shall not exceed $2,950,000; in all, $24,194,045: Provided, That ordnance materials procured under the various ordnance appropriations shall hereafter be available for issue, to meet the general needs of the naval service, under the appropriation from which procured.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. PADGETT. First, I want to offer a slight amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized, after which the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. PADGETT. On page 39, at the end of line 14, in the second proviso, the word "further" should be inserted after the word "Provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PADGETT: Page 39, line 14, after the word "Provided," insert the word "further."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, when I first heard of the so-called British tank I was very much interested, and it set me to thinking. There was something familiar about the machine. When I saw it yesterday afternoon for the first time it set me to thinking again, and I recalled a bit of history in the legislation of this House that I was present at the making of when I had service on the Committee on Military Affairs. It was in the year 1912, six years ago, that an American citizen came before the Committee on Military Affairs and strongly urged the construction of about 8,000 armored cars. He was slightly extravagant in his expectations of what we should do, although at that time it was not contemplated that they should be so big as they are now. He recommended the construction of 8,000 armored cars, which were the British tank of to-day, except not grown to such huge proportions as this hideous monster that we saw here yesterday. Now, a prophet is not without honor save in his own country, but I shall endeavor to do that man a little bit of justice by putting into the RECORD, with the consent of the House, a brief document, only two pages of print, which shows that in 1912 this precise instrument of destruction that has caused such a sensation in military circles in the last two of three years was forecasted and requested as an effective instrument of war.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not take up the time to read any part of this now, because I want to use my five minutes otherwise, but with the privilege of putting it into the RECORD. There is one other bit of work that was suggested by that man in connection with the use of those armored cars, to which I specially invite the attention of the House.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have not the time.

Mr. SLOAN. I just wanted to know whether the caterpillar tractor was in his scheme of affairs.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not remember about that, but it was the armored car with everything, perhaps, except the truck on which it runs. I read now from what he said:

It is recognized that such cars would be destroyed by a 3-inch or larger unexploded shell penetrating their armor, the same as field guns would be destroyed; but the probabilities of being damaged in this way would be very small, because when discovered they could be changed to new positions, while cloth targets of the same size and colors could be left to exhaust the enemy's supply of ammunition and discourage him from continuing such attacks.

I believe that that is the first re ference that I have ever heard, I believe it is the first reference made, to what we now commonly call camouflage, with variations as to pronunciation. This reference to camouflage was made by this same American citizen, Mr. Willard S. Isham, who also suggested the armored car that has been developed into the British tank of to-day.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman also permit the suggestion there that this same man, Isham, who has appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs a number of times——

Mr. SLAYDEN. For several years.

Mr. ANTHONY. For several years has been battling with both departments of the Navy and War, to my knowledge, for the last 10 years, in order to secure the adoption of the principle of the high-explosive shell as against the armor-piercing shell.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is true.

Mr. ANTHONY. And has been designated by those departments as a crank, but the present war has demonstrated that he was absolutely right on the principle of the high-explosive shell.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas permit me to suggest something there?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to use a little of my own time. I yield on the condition that I can get an extension.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to do with this controversy as to the relative merits of the armor-piercing shells and the high-explosive shells. I only wish that the British Navy could get an opportunity oftener and under better circumstances to test the relative value of the two shells, either one of which I hope will be effective; but undoubtedly Mr. Isham, during those years I refer to, when my distinguished friend from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] and I were colleagues on the committee, was advocating the high-explosive shell, which I believe has demonstrated its value in war.

There is one other thing that that man was doing during those times. He had also discovered a plan for making what he called a diving shell or projectile. It was a projectile that would go down into the water and then explode. That was the ancestor, direct and immediate, not so very remote, of the depth bomb that is now used, the same principle precisely. He has patents on it, I believe. Anyway, he invented and recommended and urged on the attention of the committee of Congress the procurement of a depth shell.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Just a moment.

Mr. PADGETT. The depth bomb is entirely different from the diving shell. The diving shell is intended to be shot out of a gun and ricochet, and the depth bomb is just rolled off the side of the ship and the ship runs away from it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. In one case you shoot at the bird and in the other you try to get on top of him and drop salt on his tail. That is the distinction. The way the harm is done to the enemy is by the explosion of the shell after you get it in the water. How you deliver it against the sides of the ship or in the vicinity of the enemy's ship I think is not of so very great importance. The most important thing is to get it there. This man did urge that thing at that time, and I believe, Mr. Chairman, that as a simple act of justice to an American inventor, who was something of a prophet, who had a vision, this statement ought to be made. The fact that he has been classed as a crank by the people whom my friend from Kansas quoted is not against him. He is in good company. Mr. S. F. B. Morse, Mr. Ends, Ericsson, Langley, Edison, and other men who have made great epoch-making discoveries were also cranks, and I congratulate any man who gets into that class. He has certainly secured a place in the hall of fame.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing this pamphlet.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

ARMORED CARS.

To the House Committee on Military Affairs.

GENTLEMEN: Your attention is respectfully directed to the urgency of greatly strengthening our mobile Army and also to the ease with which this can be accomplished by means of armored cars capable of containing and protecting behind armor plate the highly trained men composing the Army while still further increasing their offensive power and mobility.

It is recognized that the functions of this committee are limited primarily to matters pertaining to the mobile Army, but it is also recognized that if our Navy can prevent a hostile army from entering our borders there is little need for an Army, while if it can not do this the necessity for a powerful Army is imminent. Hence a few facts relative to the weakness of our Navy as a deterrent to foreign invasion are considered germane and are introduced as a necessary part of this presentation.

A glance at the statistical records of the development in the navies of the leading great powers show that all countries save the United States possess and are rapidly constructing fast battleships of about 28 knots speed armed with the most powerful guns. These ships are constructed, as stated in tactical journals, to sweep the seas of slower vessels possessing lighter armament. That they can do this is universally admitted. Hence, it is evident that were we forced into war with any foreign power our scouts, cruisers, and torpedo fleets could not fulfill their most important function, that of finding and watching an enemy, without incurring the risk of almost certain destruction. It is therefore obvious that these ships must remain between the lines of our slower battleships; meanwhile an enemy's fast scout ships employing wireless telegraphy could direct the movement of a fleet of transports to its destination without risk of discovery. Hence, our Navy to-day does not afford any obstacle to the movement of foreign transports. A landing effected on our borders would force us to an aggressive warfare, to meet which a glance at the statistical records of the armies of different countries is even less reassuring to us than a comparison by navies, and compel us to admit that in the number of men and guns our Army is woefully behind that of any foreign power and hence we could not hope for it as now equipped to protect this country from an invasion which our Navy is powerless to prevent. Hence the necessity for a great increase in the strength of our mobile Army if it and our other lines of defense are being maintained for the purpose of either affording us or convincing other powers of our security against foreign attack.

This brings us to the practical consideration of the means to be employed to secure the required increase in strength. The cost of maintaining soldiers in the field in the United States is greater than in any other country. Therefore to enable us to meet the military competition of these countries as we do their industrial competition, we should increase the efficiency of our soldiers by giving them a superiority of equipment and machinery as is done in the shops and factories of this country. This can be accomplished by placing the men, or a portion of them who use the military rifle, in bullet-proof armored cars capable of operating on any terrain. These cars will be provided with telescopes and range finders to discover an enemy and determine his range. Without this equipment, which soldiers can not carry, ammunition will be wasted and the results will be a minimum, since in war there are no target men to signal that a shot is low or high and without which, even on the target range, no results could be secured. The weight of such cars, with a crew of five men, should not exceed 5,000 pounds to enable them to easily pass over bad roads. These should be provided with at least 25-horsepower motors geared down to truck speed and should be provided with a winch head and cable to enable them to pull themselves or other cars or material across an otherwise impassable slough or stream or up even the steepest and most impassable of slopes. By means of such cars covered on all sides by one-fourth inch armor plate a zone of fire might be safely entered and the advance of an enemy checked, and field material might be advanced or retired to secure better results or to save it from capture, a tactical move proven to be impossible with horses by the Russo-Japanese War. Acting as fire-control and observation stations, the fire of artillery and the movement of forces could be directed, and the operations of an enemy could be watched with safety. At night the automatic guns in these cars could be set to sweep roads and rake the barbed-wire entanglements. If surrounded by an enemy, they could be fired on with impunity by friends, since their armor would be impervious on all sides. Hence the danger of being crushed by a night attack, the bugbear of raw troops, would be absolutely eliminated by such cars.

It is recognized that such cars would be destroyed by a 3-inch or larger unexploded shell penetrating their armor, the same as field guns would be destroyed; but the probabilities of being damaged in this way would be very small, because when discovered they could be changed to new positions, while cloth targets of the same size and color could be left to exhaust the enemy's supply of ammunition and discourage him from continuing such attacks. If the argument of vulnerability is of any value against these cars, it applies with overwhelming force against the use of artillery, which can not be moved from its position and saved when its location has been determined and artillery has begun its destruction. It may be argued that these cars would become stalled in sloughs and time would be lost. If this were true and was an objection to their use, in view of their advantages each battery of five cars working together and forming a unit should be accompanied by a 6-horse team to pull them across such places until they enter the zones of fire, after which they would be compelled to select passable routes. Hence, lack of mobility is not a valid argument against the use of armored cars of this description, since they can move with horses anywhere that artillery can move and, moreover, and what is infinitely more important, can leave a sheltered position and move to attack at a critical moment or change to a new position under fire when artillery could not move.

Scattered and concealed along the line of battle, perhaps sheltered behind natural or artificial protection from which they could rush out and overwhelm any advance, they become a guaranty against the advance of any enemy however strong or well trained. If our Army is now able to do this without such means, what would be the unnecessary cost to us in our best blood and what would be the subsequent cost in treasure to properly recompense for such unnecessary sacrifice. The records of all modern wars show that about 95 per cent of the casualties of battle have resulted from the rifle bullet. Can any consideration of cost be brought against the use of armored cars that would prevent this 95 per cent of casualties, especially when the efficiency of the men in the cars would be correspondingly increased? These are a few of the reasons why such cars should be purchased at once. The cost of 8,000 of these cars, enough to contain our entire Infantry and Cavalry forces in this country, would be less than a single battleship and would make this country impregnable against the attack of any nation or combination of nations. These cars possess no untried elements that need to be tested to determine their practicability. Hence, at least two batteries of five cars each should be purchased at once and their operations observed in the maneuvers of the Army during the present year to determine whether horses will be required with them and to establish their tactical uses in order that the number required for the service may be determined and appropriated for at an early date. It is therefore requested that this committee authorize the expenditure by the Secretary of War of $50,000 for the purchase of 10 cars fulfilling the requirements herein described and forming part of their specifications.

I am, respectfully,

WILLARD S. ISHAM.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to state the Committee on Naval Affairs in the several years past has appropriated and the department has expended more than $300,000 in testing the high-explosive shell. There is no lack of trying to develop it. We have appropriated and expended more than that amount of money on that shell.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to substantiate in part what the chairman of the committee has just said. I think that Congress has been very liberal with the gentleman whose name was just mentioned by my good friend from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] as being the originator of an idea. He did have an idea for a retarded-action fuse. They are calling it a diving shell to-day. He had a good idea, which has since been very largely developed by the Navy Department, and because the Navy Department has developed it he believes that the Government should pay him for what the department has done.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I just want to say to the gentleman that I know nothing about the controversy or contention on the part of Isham that the Government owes him anything for infringing on his idea, but my object was only to establish one or two interesting facts of history.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Isham called at my office this morning and said that certain Members were going to talk about his shell to-day. I believe he is contending for some money from the Navy Department——

Mr. SLAYDEN. I desire to explain to the gentleman the point I am trying to make. I know nothing about that; I have not talked with Mr. Isham about that; I would refuse to talk with him or anybody else on that subject. I know nothing about the contention between him and the Government as to payment for any infringement of his patent, but my reason for speaking here was to establish the fact that years ago, before there was any dispute between him and the Government, Mr. Isham was contending for the same thing, and at the same time he suggested what we now call as camouflage——

Mr. BRITTEN. I am willing to agree with my good friend from Texas that Mr. Isham has a wonderful brain and the greatest imagination possible.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And the gentleman says the Navy Department developed his ideas?

Mr. BRITTEN. His ideas on the retarded-action fuse are all right, but he never developed anything, and he is complaining now because the Navy Department may have developed his ideas and should pay him a bonus for having done so.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I thought the gentleman said they had developed them.

Mr. BRITTEN. Not fully.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I thought the gentleman stated as a fact that they had developed them.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; they have to a very great degree.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not want to deny the gentleman's knowledge of technical matters connected with the Navy of which he knows a great deal more than I do, but it has been brought to my attention by a man who claims to know what he is talking about that the reason for German domination of many of the battle fields of Europe has been by reason of their advanced use of the high-explosive shell.

Mr. BRITTEN. I think the gentleman is entirely correct, but he is talking about land battles. This retarded-action fuse for which Mr. Isham claimed so much applied to a high-explosive shell that was to be used in the Navy.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman permit me to say in justice to this man Isham that years ago, four or six years ago, when he was appearing before committees pleading for adoption of the high-explosive shell, the experts of the Ordnance Department were contending that they were unable to use the high-explosive shell for big guns for fear of the charge bursting; that it could not be used safely at certain temperatures. Now, the Germans have accepted the principle of that same explosive shell. In all the armies on the battle fields of Europe they are using the high-explosive shell.

The effect on ships of all classes of underwater explosion, whether of shells, torpedoes, or mines, during this war has been uniformly of a most serious nature. If they have not been sunk immediately, in every case the effect has been such as to destroy their fighting efficiency, and since the diving shell and fuse invented by Mr. Isham has been available for years, and merely required the cooperation of the department to have had it in use in the navies of our allies as well as our own, it is interesting to think what might have been the results in this war and especially in a certain indecisive naval engagement had such fuses been employed, which would also have made all the shells striking short of the ships veritable mines. The same is true of the armored car, and it is likewise true that Germany had prepared herself by storing up high-explosive shells and big guns to shoot them while other countries declared such shells and guns to be useless.

Mr. BRITTEN. What the gentleman says merely demonstrates once more the fact that the Navy always goes ahead of the Army. When the gentleman's committee or the Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance of the Army refused to consider these important ideas the Navy Department was spending money to demonstrate the value of the Isham idea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval proving ground: For increasing facilities for the proof and test of ordnance material, including necessary buildings, construction, equipment, railroad facilities, land, and damages and losses to persons, firms, and corporations, resulting from the procurement of the land for this purpose, and also all necessary expenses incident to the procurement of said land, $1,000,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that paragraph. It has already been enacted into law.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MAYS). The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment to strike out the paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent, Bureau of Ordnance: For miscellaneous items, namely, cartage, expenses of light and water at ammunition depots and stations, tolls, ferriage, technical books, and incidental expenses attending inspection of ordnance material, $9,500.

Mr. BRITTEN. Before we leave the paragraph I would like to say just a few words about the care that was given by the Navy to some of the German merchant ships that were recently taken over by our Government. The one I have particularly in mind is the former steamer Vaterland, now called the Leviathan. I think the House may be interested to know that when one of the big German ships steamed past Governors Island some months ago on her way with our troops to Europe, a German who was interned there rubbed his eyes in amazement and said, "Is not that the German ship So-and-so?" When he was told that it was, he said, "Why, I was on that ship, and it can not be possible that the American Government has repaired it in this short time. I myself broke certain flanges that I was sure could not be repaired within 8 or 10 months." He said, "That ship is now going out under an American flag."

When I was in New York last year I went over the Vaterland and saw some of the destruction that had been wrought by the Germans before they left the ship. Apparently irreparable damage had been done, but with our usual ingenuity we developed new processes with great success. Electrical welding was used, and that enormous ship was put into commission at less than 50 per cent of the cost estimated by a committee of expert engineers, who had determined that the damage on this single ship would cost in the neighborhood of $850,000.

It is interesting to know that the Vaterland was a ship of 56,000 tons, was 944 feet long—in other words, almost twice as long as the Washington Monument is high. If stood on her stern she would overtop the Woolworth Building, in New York, by 200 feet. Because of the height of her smokestacks she could not get under the Brooklyn Bridge, and she had to be docked at Hoboken. Her speed was 26 knots, and she cost the German Government $30,000,000. She had 14 separate decks. In other words, the steamer was 14 stories high; 46 boilers required a crew of 350 men in the engine room; and she carried 9,000 tons of coal—think of it, 9,000 tons of coal fuel. Her operation required four captains and one commodore. She had made only two trips as a passenger ship when the European war broke out.

She had 18 different sets of elevators, 530 electrically equipped clocks, all of them wound and set by a master clock in the commodore's office. She contained a great wonderful Venetian swimming pool of marble, one of the most wonderful pools to be found anywhere on earth, much less on a ship. The ceiling of the dining room was not quite so high as the Hall of this House but it was an enormous room that resembled very much the largest dining room in the largest and finest hotels of our country. There were no great columns in the center of the room. The ceiling was finely arched.

The principal repair work on this ship was done under Commander E. P. Jessop, for whose ability I have a very high regard and who should have been attached to that ship as its first commander. He was ably assisted by Lieut. Commander McWhorter. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact, and it applies to all of the German ships, that these repairs were made within from 10 to 15 per cent of the time it was ordinarily expected it would take, and the ships were put on the high seas and are now in the transport service.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Were those damages done to those ships before the declaration of war?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. I was very much interested in the gentleman's several statements of fact, but the first was of main importance and significance. That was the surprise in the heart of the interned German at what America was able to accomplish. Does the gentleman not think that he made on a small scale the same mistake as to the capacity of America and Americans that his Kaiser has been making up to this time?

Mr. BRITTEN. I sincerely hope so.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF YARDS AND DOCKS.

Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks: For general maintenance of yards and docks, namely, for books, maps, models, and drawings; purchase and repair of fire engines; fire apparatus and plants; machinery, operation or repair, purchase; maintenance of horses and driving teams; carts, timber wheels, and all vehicles, including motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes, and including motor-propelled vehicles for freight-carrying purposes only for use in the navy yards; tools and repair of the same; stationery; furniture for Government houses and offices in navy yards and naval stations; coal and other fuel; candles, oil, and gas; attendance on light and power plants; cleaning and clearing up yards and care of buildings; attendance on fires, lights, fire engines, and fire apparatus and plants; incidental labor at navy yards; water tax, tolls, and ferriage; pay of watchmen in navy yards; awnings and packing boxes; and for pay of employees on leave, $7,000,000: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for clerical, inspection, drafting, messenger, and other classified work in the navy yards and naval stations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, shall not exceed $2,000,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PADGETT offers the following committee amendment: Page 42, at the end of line 18, add the following: "Provided, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used for the purchase of more than 75 passenger-carrying automobiles for official use within the United States and its insular possessions: And provided further, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used for the purchase of such passenger-carrying automobiles at a greater cost than $500 each: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to distribute the high-powered automobiles now owned and in use in the United States and its insular possessions to such places and service as they may be required."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest a modification of the amendment. The first "Provided" ought to be "Provided further."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have a division on this amendment, so that I may have an opportunity of voting against it. I would like very much to have it appear in the RECORD, so that I can use it hereafter, so that no question may arise as to my position. I want to vote against the amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Would the gentleman object to telling us why?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I do, because it would take a lot of time.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But we want some information.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, I can give the gentleman the information while walking out in the corridor and not take up the time now. There will be no use of objecting to it. I did object to it, and I am the only one.

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, no. The gentleman is mistaken there.

Mr. BUTLER. I am wrong about that, but the gentleman was not there when the thing happened.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment. My good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] has just called attention to the fact that he is opposed to the amendment, but he does not desire to take the time of the House to explain his position. I think it is only fair, if a vote is to be taken, that we know what this amendment contemplates.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield to me for a moment I shall make a statement that I think will clarify the situation.

Mr. BRITTEN. Very well, I yield.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, under various appropriations in the bill they can purchase automobiles. We had an investigation of the matter, and we found there had been purchased heretofore a number of automobiles for which they were paying from $1,500 to more than $3,000 each. They have on hand a number of automobiles. They need more for the war, but the committee felt there should be a limitation on the number that should be purchased, and after investigation we fixed the number at 75, but we also put in a limitation that they shall not purchase an automobile at a higher cost than $500. They were purchasing some at $3,000, some above $3,000, and some at $2,500. We think they have enough of the high-priced machines, and we asked the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, Admiral Parks, if it would hinder or interfere with the operations if they were limited to the purchase of machines not to cost above $500, and to use the high-powered machines they have now by redistributing them where they needed the high-powered machines, and he said it would not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What automobile can they get in the United States for $500 or less?

Mr. PADGETT. The Ford.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And this means then that they are ordered to purchase 75 Ford machines?

Mr. PADGETT. Not more than 75. They have a great many, and they estimated for about 100 Ford machines. They are using them, and they say to us in the beginning they were ordering high-powered machines from abroad, but now they are asking for Fords.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. COX. Who is to use these machines; the officers, or are they to be used in the transportation of enlisted men?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; they are to be used in work between the yards and stations.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does the gentleman know how many machines there are in use?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; we have that here; we have a statement here. I believe there are 234.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And this will add how many to that number?

Mr. PADGETT. Seventy-five. They made an estimate for four more. There are 232.

Mr. BUTLER. During what period have they been purchased?

Mr. PADGETT. A great many have been purchased since the war began.

Mr. BUTLER. Out of the lump appropriation?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and they had a number of them before the war began; but the committee felt that there should be a limitation placed upon the price to be paid for these machines, and we asked Admiral Parks upon two different occasions if a limitation on the purchase of these machines be put at $500 would it embarrass the service, and he said it would not; that they could distribute the ones they have—the high-powered, faster machines—to places where they are actually needed.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Are those all passenger automobiles?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What possible use can they have for so many passenger machines?

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman will bear in mind that we have in this country something like 400 navy yards and air stations, and some big ones, like New York, Philadelphia, and other places where there are yards and docks, steam engineering, and construction and repair, and all those various activities going on, they require 7, 8, or 10 machines at some of those places.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. Do they apportion the number of automobiles according to the number of ships, or use the automobiles on the ships or some place else?

Mr. PADGETT. They use them at the navy yards and the naval stations.

Mr. MADDEN. Why did the committee designate some particular make of automobile?

Mr. PADGETT. We did not designate any particular make.

Mr. MADDEN. It is the same thing; you might as well as to make specifications that would not apply to anything else in the world.

Mr. PADGETT. But it is an impossibility to put a limitation without including somebody and excluding somebody else.

Mr. BUTLER. There are several makes of machines that sell for less than $500.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment pending—substitute $1,500 for $500 in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment: Strike out "$500" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,500."

Mr. BRITTEN. Now, here is the situation, gentlemen: The Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks provides automobiles where they are deemed necessary in the interest of the service. We have established aviation bases along the Atlantic coast. There are a great many of them. Some of you would be surprised to know how many aviation bases and patrol stations we have established along the Atlantic coast and where the use of automobiles is necessary. Every big navy yard requires automobiles; many of them for inspection purposes and to go into the country where mechanical parts are being manufactured for seaplanes and for ships, and to-day we are going to say to commandants, who have at their disposal millions of dollars of Government money—men on whose honesty we are depending to expend that money judiciously in the interests of the Government—we are going to say, "Here, Capt. So-and-So, here are several million dollars; go and take an option on land adjoining a navy yard, as we have in Washington; buy this land as cheaply as you can and save the Government every dollar you can, but when it is necessary to go away from your yard and the Government provides an automobile, we can not give you anything but a Ford—a 'tin Lizzie.'" And that is not all.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will.

Mr. COX. That will take them there and bring them back.

Mr. MADDEN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. In a moment. On the front door of that car you must have in great big letters, in complete contrast with the color of the car, according to an order issued by the Secretary of the Navy, the words "For official use only." That is on the front door.

On the second door you must have a great big coat of arms about so high, almost as big as the door itself, and the words "United States Government," for fear that this man who has charge of the investment of millions and millions of dollars might use that car to go down to attend to some little personal business, such as buying a collar or a pair of shoes. We expect that man to be honest, we expect him to spend millions of dollars of Government money just as if it were his own and trust him to do so, and then we turn around and say that we are too poor to furnish for official use anything but a little Ford.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Let me talk for a moment on the amendment, if you please, and then I will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. In a moment.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that a very proper place to put the question I want to propound.

Mr. BRITTEN. Go ahead.

Mr. MADDEN. I was wondering whether my colleague was afraid that when an officer was compelled to ride in a Ford that there would not be room enough to prevent his braid from being soiled, whereas if he got a palatial car costing $1,500 it might be possible for him to sit back to have some shade, so he could keep his uniform from being hurt. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRITTEN. I am so abashed that I can not even reply to my handsome colleague from Illinois. [Laughter.] Why does he not ride in one of these $1,500 "palatial" cars instead of having one made especially for his use at a price of $5,000 or $6,000?

Mr. MADDEN. But I pay for mine.

Mr. BRITTEN. I will yield now to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. Could they not ride as quickly in a Ford as in a $1,500 car?

Mr. BRITTEN. Probably; but not so reliably.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not mean to contend that the only people who ride in these cars are commanding officers? The gentleman knows that at these naval stations the men ride in them, and in the case of the reserve the boys have joy rides in them occasionally.

Mr. BRITTEN. Can the gentleman recite an instance of that kind for the benefit of the House? I will give the gentleman the time in which to do it.

Mr. WALSH. I do not know that the gentleman can yield me in five minutes sufficient time to do that. I know that at one Naval Reserve station a man enlisted in the Naval Reserve took with him a splendid car, and his entire duty was to sit in that car from morning until night——

Mr. BRITTEN. To keep somebody from stealing it?

Mr. WALSH. Sitting by himself until the officer above him wanted to go somewhere; and when on a Sunday that car was not needed it was turned over to the officers or to the men for use in pleasure rides.

Mr. BRITTEN. Was it a Government car?

Mr. WALSH. It was his own car

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to dispose of this bill this afternoon.

Mr. BRITTEN. I wish to proceed, Mr. Chairman, for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. My object in establishing a $1,500 price is to give some leeway to the Navy Department in the purchase of these cars. There may be cases where a good car can be had for $1,500 or less. There should be a certain amount of dignity to go with an office that carries a big salary and is of very great importance, and I think we ought to accommodate the office with a car commensurate with its dignity. One thousand five hundred dollars will permit that; $500 will not.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I have actually seen Members of Congress riding in a Ford.

Mr. EMERSON. I walk.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, before the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs finishes his argument I want it to appear in this RECORD why I vote against this sort of thing. It is because of the manner of treatment of enlisted men of the service. I do not think we should use the enlisted men on these machines, either as chauffeurs or footmen. We have no real right to employ these men, who enlisted to fight and to soldier, for such a purpose as this, and therefore I will not vote for any automobile that is operated and cared for by honorably enlisted men.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. How are you going to get along with the 232 that are now in use?

Mr. BUTLER. I did not know they were purchased. I will not vote to maintain them. I want it to be perfectly plain in the RECORD, so that hereafter, if I am here, I may have an opportunity to cut this thing up from the bottom. I can not do it now. I might just as well stay out of the committee room. I am useless. I am opposed to spending $1,200 every year in the maintenance of each of these automobiles.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I confess that I am at an utter loss to understand the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, that he might as well stay out of the committee room and that he is powerless, because I think that everybody in the committee is consulted, and things are decided by the majority.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no question about that. I have not the slightest criticism. I want to say to the chairman that I only regret that my advice has not been accepted by anybody. [Laughter.]

Mr. PADGETT. I stated that we had on hand 232 automobiles in the various yards in the United States.

Mr. JUUL. How many?

Mr. PADGETT. Two hundred and thirty-two. We have about 400 stations of various kinds. Some of them use automobiles, some not. At some of the larger stations, like New York, using a number of machines, or Philadelphia and Norfolk, all places of that kind that require the use of seven or eight machines, that is proper. Now, they have been purchasing these machines out of lump-sum appropriations. A large number of them have been purchased since the war began. They will need more machines. They have got to have some abroad for use at these air stations. This limitation only applies to the United States. We do not contemplate—and I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] agrees with me fully as to that——

Mr. BUTLER. Absolutely; the best that can be had.

Mr. PADGETT. We do not contemplate purchasing the large number of machines for use at home, so that this limitation is drawn to limit the purchase to the United States, leaving the number abroad in the various stations there unlimited.

Mr. COX. If the limitation is not agreed to, how high could they pay for automobiles?

Mr. PADGETT. They have been paying as high as $3,500, and the price has now gone up to $4,000, as I understand.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can understand the necessity of having these automobiles around at our naval stations, covering several hundred acres, where a lot of time would be lost in walking around, but what do they want them abroad for? What use can they make of them abroad?

Mr. PADGETT. We have air stations there, and we have got to go up and down and preserve the service over there. We will not overstep the limit.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My friend from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] remarks that automobiles do not go up and down.

Mr. PADGETT. They go up and down the coast, looking after the air service. I have asked Admiral Park, the chief of the bureau which has general supervision, if this limitation limiting the purchase to these cheaper cars and allowing them to distribute a large number of high-priced cars to those places where they need higher-powered cars would impair the service, and he said that it would not. Later on in the examination I took the matter up again with him and said, "Now, after you have had time to think it over, do you still adhere to the statement that you gave me a while ago, that it will not hamper the service or interfere with it?" He said, "I do." Now, the idea was they wanted 50 cars at $2,500 each. I do not think they ought to purchase 50 cars at $2,500 each. I think the official service can be performed by the use of cars not exceeding $500 each, and that is why I have put in this limitation upon the purchase.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, who has been here for a great many years, how these naval officers managed to get around to the department and navy yards before the automobile was invented?

Mr. FARR. In the same way that all the rest of us did.

Mr. PADGETT. Before the automobile came into use our Navy was very small, the yards were limited in their activities, and the comparison of activities then to now would be almost as 1 to 25 or 30.

Mr. BRITTEN. And the Government provided horses and carriages?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Some time ago a visitor in the galleries made this very searching observation: "I notice that when a small appropriation is discussed it takes a good deal of time, but when there is a $10,000,000 appropriation discussed, it is done very briefly." He wanted to know why that was. I wish he might be here to-day.

On page 39 of this bill is an appropriation of $26,500,000; another one on the same page of $2,400,000; one on page 40, with reference to the new batteries for ships of the Navy, $48,000,000; on the same page, ammunition for vessels, $39,000,000; on the same page, torpedoes and appliances, $1,000,000; also reserve ordnance supplies, $50,000,000; totaling probably $170,000,000. All these appropriations required very little discussion. But here is a case of a Ford automobile that has required discussion something like 30 minutes. If I were to undertake to answer his query, why we spend so much time on the small appropriations and so little time on the large ones, I would be at a loss, unless it would be that we all know something about the Ford and would like to give the public our valuable contribution on the Ford, while on these larger items we do not know enough about them to give any information of value. Whether that be true or not, it is a comment, it seems to me, upon the legislative body becoming so enthusiastic and taking so much time on matters of whether, for example, the Secretary of State should have an automobile or whether the Speaker of the House should have a Ford, or this kind or that kind of a car—items of prior appropriation bills which have held this House for hours in heated debate in other days. While it is not my habit to inject anything in the form of a lecture, which I would not be guilty of, that observation was made by a visitor in the gallery not long ago. He is not here to-day, and I am not making this observation for that purpose, but just to call attention of the House to the fact that an appropriation of $170,000,000 has been adopted without debate and little observation. It does not take much time to decide on items of mammoth drains on the Treasury, while an appropriation for a Ford automobile takes a great deal of time, in which the entire membership of the House becomes absorbed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Did the gentleman ever buy a Ford automobile?

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. Let us vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is called for. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks.

Mr. PADGETT. I wish to offer an amendment just after the caption "Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 43, after line 1, insert the following as a separate paragraph:

"Hospital construction: For additional temporary hospital construction and repairs as may be necessary at the points named herein and to provide same with suitable hospital facilities, Chelsea, Mass., $350,000; Newport, R. I., $500,000; New London, Conn., $150,000; Brooklyn, N. Y., $1,400,000; Wards Island, N. Y., $1,250,000; Pelham, N. Y., $900,000; Philadelphia, Pa., $355,000; League Island, Pa., $800,000; Norfolk, Va., $1,250,000; Hampton Roads, Va., $500,000; Charleston, S. C., $850,000; Paris Island, S. C., $175,000; Great Lakes, Ill., $65,000; Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, $150,000; overseas, $1,000,000; contingent, $600,000; in all, $10,295,000."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I shall be very glad to.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask if any of the appropriation proposed in this amendment is to be available for the establishment of naval hospitals at points other than those mentioned.

Mr. PADGETT. They are mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. There is a large contingent appropriation.

Mr. PADGETT. That contingent is to take care of general unknown and undeveloped things that may come up at these places.

Mr. WALSH. At these various places?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Heretofore there have been appropriations made for these various points, have there?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; they have activities going on there now. A great deal of it was under lump-sum appropriations, and much of it was under appropriations carried in the deficiency bills heretofore.

Mr. WALSH. There was nothing carried in the last naval appropriation bill by way of specific appropriations?

Mr. PADGETT. Not for this particular purpose at that time. There was something given for this in the deficiency bill.

Mr. WALSH. Could any part of the moneys appropriated here be utilized for enlargement of the buildings?

Mr. PADGETT. Some of it is for new buildings, some of it for improvement and enlargement and additions, so as to put more beds in these hospitals, and other facilities to take care of the larger number of patients.

Mr. WALSH. And it includes the maintenance appropriation as well?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Has the gentleman any explanation to offer why only $65,000 is contained in the amendment for hospital facilities for the Great Lakes, while over $2,000,000 is carried for hospital facilities in the State of New York?

Mr. PADGETT. Because at the Great Lakes the hospitals there have been developed, and we have spent in hospitals there between two and three million dollars already, and this was simply a little additional work. I want to say that the committee gave a special hearing to Dr. Braisted, the Surgeon General, and we have printed the hearings. He went into this very carefully, and I think he has administered the medical department and hospital service with extraordinary and very commendable economy and efficiency. I believe every member of the committee will cheerfully bear me out in that statement.

Mr. JUUL. And the gentleman thinks the hospital facilities at the Great Lakes are quite ample?

Mr. PADGETT. They have tremendous ones there. I might state at this point that we have a provision to come in later on, an amendment, to authorize the taking over the purchase of the land on which we have spent two or three million dollars at the Great Lakes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As I heard the amendment read, it proposes an aggregate expenditure of $10,000,000 or more?

Mr. PADGETT. About that; but it is distributed in different places.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And the items are of very great importance, some of them?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When was the hearing had upon this amendment?

Mr. BROWNING. On April 11. Here it is.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The bill was reported March 10?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How came it that during all these weeks of investigation as to what appropriations would be necessary for the Navy Department, an item which is to involve the expenditure of $10,000,000 was not inquired into, at least to the extent of having any hearing before the committee, until almost a month after the bill was reported?

Mr. PADGETT. The matter is very easy to explain. The estimate was sent, first, to the Appropriations Committee for inclusion in the deficiency appropriation bill. They did include a small amount of it, and Mr. SHERLEY, the chairman of that committee, came to me and said that these matters did not belong properly as deficiencies, that they were original items and should be stricken out, and he disallowed them in the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When was this matter referred to the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. PADGETT. Early in the session, I think. I do not remember. The Senate added an amendment increasing it by $5,000,000 and something, and in the conference the House conferees, as Mr. SHERLEY informs me, disagreed to the Senate amendment because they said it was a matter to go before the Naval Committee for inclusion in the naval bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This is $5,000,000 of the $10,000,000?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; something about $5,000,000, and the demands and the developments of the war, the proposed increase in this bill, which has already passed in the committee, adding $78,000 to the Navy and $45,500 to the Marine Corps, necessitate a provision for larger care.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So that Surg. Gen. Braisted could not know until after Congress had required these increases what the necessities would demand?

Mr. PADGETT. He could not tell beforehand.

Mr. BRITTEN. Answering the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], it is a fact that the Surgeon General of the Army and the Surgeon General of the Navy have just made an agreement for establishing a uniform number of cubic feet of air space for each man in the Army and the Navy. That has been done only recently and because of that agreement greater quarters were required, and a lot of this money will go into the construction of hospitals because of the increase in the number of cubic feet per man.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Money of the public could not be expended for a better purpose.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask a question. I understand that this appropriation is intended for the construction of permanent buildings and improvements. Is that true?

Mr. PADGETT. No; it is specified as temporary, but the character of the building, I want to say, will be such that it will be available for use, if cared for, for 25 or 30 years or more, depending upon climatic conditions and the upkeep, the painting, keeping it in the proper state of repair.

Mr. McKENZIE. My purpose in asking that question is this: Of course we all understand now that the Navy is a very large institution, and a great many men are to be taken care of. The permanent structures, of course, will be intended to take care of the Navy in time of peace.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. This is wood construction, but the material selected is of a good class, so that it will not be ramshackle and fall down, and they stated that while it is of this temporary character in that sense of the word, it will be permanent in the sense that it will serve for a number of years.

Mr. McKENZIE. And to a large extent the purpose of it is to take care of the emergency now existing.

Mr. PADGETT. The necessity of the present demands it; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy yard, Portsmouth, N. H.: Addition to machine shop, $200,000; addition to foundry, $130,000; power-plant improvements, $150,000; in all, $480,000.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 43, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following as a separate paragraph:

"Submarine base, New London, Conn.: For the further development of the submarine base at New London, Conn., including erection and equipment of repair shops, the provision of additional berthing space, and the erection of quarters and barracks for officers and men, $750,000."

Mr. BUTLER. That is what we considered yesterday morning?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. I do not believe that it makes any difference where the item goes in, but in accordance with the order maintained throughout the bill I submit that it ought to come between lines 7 and 8, following the coast on down.

Mr. PADGETT. There are no items of that character, and it could be inserted at any point, so far as the geographical situation is concerned.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy yard, Boston, Mass.: Improvement of central power plant, $75,000.

Mr. PADGETT. I offer an amendment on line 7, page 43.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, line 7, strike out "$75,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$425,000."

Mr. BUTLER. Is that a committee amendment?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; it was agreed to yesterday. It is for enlargement of the power plant and capacities at the Boston Navy Yard.

Mr. BUTLER. The thing went through so fast yesterday I did not catch on.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is not it necessary that that power plant be improved?

Mr. PADGETT. It is for the activities going on at that yard. I submitted it to the committee yesterday.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy yard, Philadelphia, Pa.: Dry dock, to complete, $2,000,000; central power-plant improvements, $300,000; tracks, streets, and sewers, $100,000; in all, $2,400,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 43, line 15, at the beginning of the paragraph, before the word "for," insert the following: "depot of supplies, Philadelphia, Pa."

Mr. BUTLER. What is that?

Mr. PADGETT. It is just simply to give a title to the paragraph; that is all. There is a depot of supplies, Philadelphia, Pa., and that should be inserted before the word "for." It is just an official designation.

Mr. BUTLER. This is the beginning of something for the future. We start in with a subject in this bill known as a depot of supplies.

Mr. PADGETT. Col. Radford has been at the head of it——

Mr. BUTLER. I know, and there is no better man living than Col. Radford, but I am looking ahead for 5, 10, or 15 years.

Mr. PADGETT. In drafting the bill, that designation was left out.

Mr. BUTLER. It never did have any, I do not think. I do not recall it, if it had.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman is mistaken.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The unexpended balance of $40,434.23 of appropriation of $200,000 in the act approved June 15, 1917, making appropriations to supply deficiencies for the purchase of additional land, Depot of Supplies, Marine Corps, Philadelphia, Pa., is hereby made available for the purchase of a lot of land lying on the south side of Alter Street and beginning about 60 feet west of Broad Street in the city of Philadelphia, extending about 210 feet and 6 inches on Alter Street and extending south about 40 feet, including all buildings thereon and for adapting said buildings for uses connected with said depot.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; it is in answer to a communication from Col. Radford and seeks to correct a description given in the text. It is to strike out that and insert the correct description. It does not add anything to it or take anything from it, except it properly describes the land.

Mr. BUTLER. We had read that paragraph and had gone some distance on the next one. I have no objection, if the chairman wants to ask permission.

Mr. PADGETT. No; we had only got down to the top of page 44, and this is to strike out that paragraph and insert.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 33, lines 18 to 27, both inclusive, and lines 1 and 2 on page 44, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"The unexpended balance of $40,434.23 of appropriation of $200,000 in the act approved June 15, 1917, making appropriations to supply deficiencies for the purchase of additional land, Depot of Supplies, Marine Corps, Philadelphia, Pa., is hereby made available for the purchase of all necessary land lying between Alter Street, Elsworth Street, and Fifteenth Street in the city of Philadelphia, including all buildings thereon and for adapting such buildings for uses connected with said depot."

Mr. WALSH. The purpose of this amendment is not to buy additional land than that designated?

Mr. PADGETT. No; it is to correct the boundaries and descriptions in the text that is in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not get my question. The purpose of this paragraph in the bill, as originally reported, is not to buy for the Government tracts of land other than that which was intended at the time the deficiency appropriation was made.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; there are some little additional lands to straighten out the boundaries, rather, and to enlarge their activities.

Mr. WALSH. How much of the suburbs of this great city will be taken over?

Mr. PADGETT. It takes over very little; it runs by feet.

Mr. WALSH. Not very many houses?

Mr. PADGETT. It is a little triangle that runs in between streets there, and this is to strike that out and give some additional frontage.

Mr. BUTLER. So as to disabuse the mind of my good friend, I desire to state it is not in my district.

Mr. EMERSON. Regular order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman a question. Coming from a State where one has to hew rigidly to the line in the matter of appropriations, I ask is not this just a little bit loose? On lines 15, 16, and 17 of page 43 is the item—

For the erection of a lumber shed and necessary railroad sidings on land now owned by the Government and occupied as a portion of the depot of supplies, $35,000.

I want to ask this question of the gentleman: Can the men charged by law with the expenditure of this money use $34,000 out of the $35,000 for a shed and $1,000 for a siding? Or is there some definition of authority somewhere telling how much you can spend for the shed and how much for the siding? You can get an awfully big shed out in my country for $35,000.

Mr. PADGETT. The hearings had before our committee showed that they needed certain land there and certain sheds and sidings in connection with the big marine clothing factory that they have there, which is manufacturing clothing for the Marine Corps and saving the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars a year.

Mr. JUUL. If the gentleman will pardon me, I have no objection to the appropriation, but it seems to me that the language does not read right, "For lumber shed, $35,000, and some sidings." Would it not be better for us, in voting on a proposition like that, to know how much we are spending for the shed and how much for the siding?

Mr. PADGETT. It is impossible to go into all those details. They send the estimates down here, and the hearings disclose fully what they are for.

Mr. JUUL. I would not like to go home and explain that a shed was to cost $35,000.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman will not have to. Nobody will ever ask him about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy yard, Washington, D. C.: Fuse and primer loading house, Bellevue magazine, $25,000; boundary fence, Bellevue magazine, $15,000; for the acquisition of additional land on the east side of the Naval Gun Factory lying south of M Street and west of Eleventh Street and for the removal of buildings thereon and the grading of the ground and construction of walls inclosing said land and equipping same for use, $488,000: Provided, That upon the acquisition of the land hereby authorized, all portions of public streets on which any squares so taken over shall abut and lying between the same, and all public alleys within said squares, together with such portions of streets and public alleys as lie between the present navy yard and the land so acquired, are hereby abandoned and closed and said portions of said streets and public alleys shall be regarded as set apart and reserved for naval purposes; in all, $533,600.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to correct a typographical error—a misprint.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PADGETT offers the following amendment: Page 44, line 5, strike out "$15,000" and in lieu thereof insert "$20,600."

Mr. PADGETT. That does not add to the total and does not change it. It is just a misprint. The amount of money is the same. The error should be corrected, though.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire a division of the paragraph so that I can vote against a part of it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to move to strike out the last word, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. BLACK. I did not understand that the gentleman wanted to speak.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not anything to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman does not desire the floor?

Mr. BUTLER. No.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask how much land is contemplated to be purchased?

Mr. PADGETT. It is out here on the east side of the navy yard. It embraces that portion of the land that is south of M Street, I believe, and east of Eleventh Street. There are, I think, either three or four blocks, and the Government owns already various lots scattered all through that region. This is purchasing the remainder of the lots, and then is to extend the wall along M Street to Eleventh Street and down Eleventh Street to the river, and to take in that. It is about 6 or 7 acres, I should say. It is given as 7 acres.

Mr. BLACK. Have contracts been made for the purchase of this land?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir. The authority is given to the President here to take it over and to pay for it under this general provision that we have provided for all these matters.

Mr. BLACK. The President would have the right to condemn the land if voluntary contracts could not be made? That is the point I wish to bring out.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, the Chair will entertain it. There is no provision whereby the Chair can submit the paragraph unless an amendment is offered.

Mr. BUTLER. Have we not the right to move an amendment to separate the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. No part of the appropriation in the bill is read or voted on unless some amendment is proposed. If the gentleman proposes an amendment to strike out a portion of the paragraph, the Chair will entertain the motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I move to strike out the whole paragraph in order to get a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the paragraph. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That portion of Eleventh Street SE. lying south of the south line of O Street SE. and west of the west face of the new Anacostia Bridge is hereby abandoned and closed, and said portion of said street, together with such land owned by the United States as is bounded on the north by the south line of O Street; on the east by the west face of the new Anacostia Bridge; on the south by the waters of the Anacostia River; and on the west by the west line of Eleventh Street, extending in a southerly direction from its point of intersection with the south line of O Street and prolonged to its intersection with the waters of the Anacostia River, is hereby set apart and reserved for naval purposes and placed under the control and jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, That at all times the proper authorities of the District of Columbia shall be permitted to have access to the area above described for the purpose of making examinations of, and repairs to, the said bridge: And provided further, That all leases heretofore granted by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to parties occupying said above-described area are hereby, in accordance with the terms of such leases, terminated.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves a point of order on the paragraph.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I can state to the gentleman that it is not to purchase any land in the District of Columbia. There is a little triangle that is formed by the streets mentioned there and the river, embracing, I suppose, about a third of an acre. That is right next to the bridge; the street that goes to the bridge, and the navy yard that comes up, belongs to the District of Columbia. The authorities of the District of Columbia agree that it may be turned over to the navy yard in order to secure the safety and the protection of the navy yard and to straighten their fence and bring it out to the bridge, which is about a third of an acre. It is the water front, and the District of Columbia has been renting it out to persons as a boat landing. It is very objectionable to have anything of that kind right there at the navy yard, where we have all these activities going on in the yard. There is no purchase; just a transfer of the jurisdiction under the Navy Department.

Mr. WALSH. Is this tract to be inclosed by this fence and wall?

Mr. PADGETT. It is a different part from that. It connects with the lower part of the navy yard on the river.

Mr. WALSH. It is not to be inclosed, then?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; it is to be inclosed.

Mr. WALSH. Why is the right reserved to the authorities of the District of Columbia to enter there for the purpose of examining and repairing the bridge?

Mr. PADGETT. This land goes right up to the abutment of the bridge. The bridge rests on the abutment on the bank of the river, and this land goes right up to the abutment.

Mr. WALSH. That is the Anacostia Bridge?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and it is to allow the District of Columbia, through its workmen and officials, to go upon the land to make examinations as to the state of the abutment and to make any repairs. If the bridge should get out of repair, they would need to have some place to get around under the abutment, next to the water's edge, and to do things of that kind.

Mr. WALSH. The leases referred to in the last proviso are leases to parties to utilize that property?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and I understand they have all expired. It does not interfere with them. Those leases were revocable at any time that it suited the District of Columbia. When we went out there to look at it they told us that as a matter of fact the leases had all terminated. If anyone will go out there and look at it, he will see that it is really a little nuisance that is stuck right in there, with boats and every sort of little craft coming in there and tying up, right at the corner of the navy yard.

Mr. WALSH. Now, one further question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. How much of Eleventh Street will be closed and discontinued by the adoption of this provision?

Mr. PADGETT. None whatever.

Mr. WALSH. It says, "That portion of Eleventh Street SE. is hereby abandoned and closed."

Mr. PADGETT. That is theoretically a part of Eleventh Street, but there is already a fence around this lot. Eleventh Street, theoretically runs to the water's edge, but practically does not.

Mr. WALSH. And this is the theoretical portion?

Mr. PADGETT. As a matter of fact, there is a little fence across that theoretical extension of Eleventh Street now, which cuts off the portion going down to the water's edge. It is closed by the fence and is not being used as a public street.

Mr. WALSH. The portion that will be legally abandoned will be from the water's edge——

Mr. PADGETT. Up to the feuce.

Mr. WALSH. That is what I wanted to understand.

Mr. PADGETT. As I have the picture in my mind, it is a distance about as far as from here to the door from the water up to that fence.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts withdraw his point of order?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question about the preceding paragraph.

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. About how much land is being acquired there?

Mr. PADGETT. About seven acres.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman know who owns it now?

Mr. PADGETT. It is owned by a number of people.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. How many buildings are on it now?

Mr. PADGETT. There are some cheap buildings, both of frame and brick, little storehouses, and so forth, on these streets.

Mr. TALBOTT. The Government already owns some of them?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I have stated that. I should suppose that there are from 20 to 40 owners.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman have any idea about how much that land is going to cost by the acre, or lot, or foot?

Mr. PADGETT. There were some hearings on it. I do not recall it just now, but this $488,000 is estimated not only to purchase that land but to take down the buildings.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. To build a wall?

Mr. BROWNING. And level the ground.

Mr. PADGETT. To build a wall and level the ground, and put it on a level with the navy yard proper, and fix it all up.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have no doubt of the wisdom of it, but I was trying to find out what the committee thought was the value of that land that was being taken.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. About $70,000 an acre.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is not a large amount in a city.

Mr. PADGETT. It is not as much as that.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy yard, Norfolk, Va.: Dry dock, to complete, $2,000,000; waterfront improvements, $500,000; improvements central power plant and distributing systems, $300,000; tracks, streets, and sewers, $150,000; galvanizing shop, $100,000; toward steel and lumber storage (limit of cost, $850,000), $400,000; in all, $3,450,000.

Mr. FESS. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question.

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. At this navy yard down in Virginia is there any disturbance by the placing of the Army there? Is there an Army cantonment there?

Mr. PADGETT. The Army has a cantonment there, but it is a number of miles away from the navy yard.

Mr. FESS. How far?

Mr. BRITTEN. At least 8 miles.

Mr. PADGETT. It is a number of miles away. The Army cantonment is down at Newport News, and is about 12 or 15 miles from Norfolk.

Mr. FESS. There was a gentleman here yesterday, and he remarked that the work down at Newport News had been greatly increased because of the Army activities at that place.

Mr. PADGETT. Newport News is 12 or 15 miles from Norfolk, and the Newport News Co. is a private shipbuilding company and not a Government activity, although they do build Government ships there. It is a private corporation.

Mr. FESS. It was suggested to me that we had not acted with very great wisdom in placing so near together the activities of the Navy and the activities of the Army.

Mr. PADGETT. The activities of the Navy, I expect, that he had reference to were not at Norfolk, but at what is known as the naval training base over at Hampton Roads.

Mr. FESS. That is what he had in mind; yes.

Mr. PADGETT. They are about 8 miles apart, on opposite sides of the water.

The Clerk read as follows:

Buildings and grounds, Naval Academy: Extension of Bancroft Hall, to complete, $1,850,000; and the limit of cost is increased to $2,850,000; improvements central power plant and distributing systems, $325,000; general store building, $100,000; in all, $2,275,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee how nearly completed are the improvements and central power plant and distributing system. I notice last year we appropriated $300,000 for improvements, and we carry $325,000 this year.

Mr. PADGETT. This is for enlargement, really. The power plant was established there a number of years ago, when each Member of Congress had one appointee. Later on the number of appointees was doubled. Later on the appointments were added to and we had three, and now we have five. Instead of having, as originally, an average attendance of something like 500, they are now expecting this approaching term 1,800, and the succeeding term they are expecting to have 2,200. The power plant and distributing system is for the power and the heat of those buildings, and the gentleman will notice there that we are adding to Bancroft Hall for the accommodation of 600 young men in that one building. This is for the heat and light and general care of that additional building. That is going to cost something like two and three-quarter million dollars. With the expenditure of the $325,000 it is expected that the central power plant and distributing system will be sufficient for the extension to Bancroft Hall and the other increased facilities there.

Mr. WALSH. That is our necessity at the present time?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. But, of course, if further extensions are made there will be needed further increase in the power plant.

Mr. PADGETT. That might be so. Of course, they have a margin or factor of safety over and above what is actually required at the time, but not a large one.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee if I can. This provides an addition of $1,850,000 for Bancroft Hall, an increase of the limit of cost to $2,850,000. Can the gentleman inform the committee how much Bancroft Hall has cost up to date; that is, the entire building?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know. Twenty years ago, before I came to Congress, the construction of the new Naval Academy was authorized, and, if I remember correctly, it was $10,000,000 or $14,000,000. I see on the floor a former distinguished chairman of this committee. I will here ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss] whether he remembers it was $10,000,000 or $12,000,000.

Mr. FOSS. I think it was in the neighborhood of $10,000,000.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not remember exactly; it was before I came to Congress.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. That was for a number of buildings.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and this was one of the buildings constructed out of that lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman inform the committee who was the architect of Bancroft Hall?

Mr. PADGETT. I expect the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] can tell the gentleman. I am very poor at remembering names. He was a civilian architect.

Mr. BUTLER. I remember it very well. I know all about it. It cost $14,000,000. Flagg was the name of the architect. He agreed to have it done for $10,000,000 and it cost $14,000,000. We asked the House to be patient and wait, and they started in the House a rumor that the North intended to steal the Naval Academy away from the South, and everybody voted for it, and they got the $14,000,000; and now you have the whole story.

Mr. PADGETT. I did not remember that.

Mr. BUTLER. I can not prevent these things, but I can see them as they pass by. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Apparently it is not the intention to construct separate buildings, but merely keep on enlarging Bancroft Hall. How long is Bancroft Hall at the present time?

Mr. PADGETT. About 800 or 900 feet.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is that all?

Mr. PADGETT. It is four stories high, I believe, and they are adding two wings on the rear, at a cost of two and three-quarter million dollars.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Of course, this undoubtedly is needed, and it is not in the mind of any of us to oppose it; but I do want to say this, which I have thought for many years: The architecture of the Naval Academy is a monstrous failure. The buildings are not adapted in the slightest degree, according to my judgment, to an academy of this character. Bancroft Hall looks like a swell apartment house on Riverside Drive in New York City.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not want to put his judgment up against the judgment of all of these statesmen on the Naval Committee, does he?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, we are neither builders nor fakes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am reminded at this time of one occasion when I visited Annapolis and had with me a very distinguished military officer from Europe. After we were permitted, with the aid of an old, decrepit soldier, to look at some of the buildings on the outside and others on the inside, we entered the august chamber of Bancroft Hall, and there, standing in the center, was a gentleman dressed and having the appearance of a head page at a showy hotel or a very austere porter. My friend said to me, "Is not this a naval academy?" I said, "Certainly; is not this a fine building?" "Yes; it is magnificent; but do you have your young men living here?" "Yes; is not this a splendid place for them?" "Yes; it is a nice home for them, a beautiful home, a great pile, but it does not appear to be adapted for a naval academy." Now, that was several years ago, and in conversation with naval officers I have found they are pretty well agreed with my friend's estimate. I wish humbly to suggest, and with the most profound interest, if it is possible to build new buildings at Annapolis instead of continually enlarging Bancroft Hall. I do not wish to make any disparagement by comparison, but no person can visit West Point and then visit Annapolis without a feeling that one is a triumph, and that is West Point, in architecture that is adapted to the needs of that sort of an institution. To my mind West Point presents in appearance, architecture, and adaptation to existing needs the most perfect and splendid institution in America. No person can visit Annapolis and see this great endless pile and feel that it is a kind of building that should be there for this purpose. Is not it possible, instead of keeping enlarging and extending this pile indefinitely and infinitely, to erect other buildings for the same purpose that will be a little more appropriate?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to have a moment more to answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BUTLER. But we have expended $14,000,000 in that property, let me say to my friend, and what will we do?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I am willing to let the $14,000,000 stay in this building, but let us not keep extending it until it covers the whole of Maryland. Let us build another building or two that is somewhat better adapted to the needs of the institution. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. That will probably be attended to after this year; as soon as they finish that they will take up the others.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President is authorized to acquire under the authority and provisions of this act all of the remaining portion of Paris Island for the enlargement of the marine recruiting station, Port Royal, S. C.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order. How much is intended to be acquired?

Mr. PADGETT. About 3,000 acres.

Mr. WALSH. How much has been already acquired?

Mr. PADGETT. A small amount; I do not know. I should say about 200 acres, or something like that. We have something like seven or eight thousand men there. Nearly every man who goes into the Marine Corps goes through that place as an advanced training point.

Mr. WALSH. There is a lump sum, I assume, somewhere in this act——

Mr. PADGETT. I think it is only about 70 acres.

Mr. WALSH. We have only 70 acres at Parris Island?

Mr. PADGETT. And they need drill-ground extension; and another thing I want to call to the attention of the gentleman and the committee, and that is the conditions there. There are a number of undesirable people there, who have little holdings around there, which is calculated to bring about bootlegging and gambling and other matters that every man can readily see without my mentioning them, and it is very necessary to have an enlargement of the activities of the recruiting station.

Mr. WALSH. Does this take in the entire island?

Mr. PADGETT. It takes in the entire island.

Mr. WALSH. Is this going to be taken for a marine recruiting station?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. How far is it from the mainland?

Mr. PADGETT. It is rather in the river that comes up there, and a great deal of that is marshland.

Mr. BRITTEN. It is a training station.

Mr. WALSH. It does not say so; it says marine recruiting station.

Mr. PADGETT. It is called a recruiting station, but nearly every man of the Marine Corps goes through there for his last training.

Mr. BRITTEN. A course of about 12 weeks. He has his initial training at Parris Island and then goes to Quantico, where they give him the finishing course. It is very important to the Marine Corps that the Parris Island purchase be left in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I assume that somewhere in the bill there is a lump-sum appropriation to cover these various authorizations for the acquisition of property.

Mr. PADGETT. That is correct. This was calculated at $160,000, not to exceed $160,000.

Mr. WALSH. For 3,000 acres?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRITTEN. I would like to remind the chairman of the committee there are some very objectionable elements at Parris Island now.

Mr. PADGETT. It should be $150,000 instead of $160,000, I find on refreshing my memory.

Mr. WALSH. How much will be required to make this island habitable to live on after these 3,000 acres are acquired?

Mr. PADGETT. I understand the conditions there are healthy now. One of the things is to remove some of the moral conditions that are there.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman contend that under the law which we have heretofore passed that the Secretary of the Navy can not clean up Parris Island?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; he can clean up the island during war, but we are taking care of it now for peace as well as for war. Under the war power we can keep them away, but the people living on the island we can not keep away from there. And there are these little huts scattered all around there consisting of a very undesirable population, one that is pretty hard to handle and deal with.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not the department has an option on this land which the $150,000 will cover?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; there is no option. It is put under the general provision, and the President will take it over and value it and pay for it under that proceeding. The title situation is very complicated. There are some contested claims that would have to be adjudicated and would have to be taken over by the President under these condemnation proceedings.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is the chairman ready to state to the members of the committee that, in his judgment, the purchase of it will not cost to exceed $150,000?

Mr. PADGETT. That is the information we get. We had a telegram sent to Gen. Cole, who is in command there, and he investigated it, and I saw him personally, and he stated that he thought that would cover it; but, of course, under a condemnation proceeding the gentleman recognizes that there is no way to limit the price. That has to be fixed by judicial proceedings.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Is this land owned largely by these undesirable people in small allotments?

Mr. PADGETT. A good deal of it is.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Is a considerable portion of it owned by one man?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; and a good deal of it is swamp land that has nothing on it at all.

Mr. MADDEN. What equipment has the Government on the island now?

Mr. PADGETT. It has a good deal. On the 70 acres that the Government owns they have two main buildings, and they have leases, I think, on some 700 or 800 acres of it for drill grounds, on which they have the equipment necessary for the drilling and training of these men.

Mr. MADDEN. What water surrounds the island?

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman means what river that is?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes. Is it navigable?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. It is Port Royal Harbor. At one time it was a naval station. Ships went up there.

Mr. MADDEN. What has to be done with the river now to make it capable of meeting the situation that is required to be met?

Mr. PADGETT. Nothing whatever to the river.

Mr. MADDEN. Any docks to be built?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. MADDEN. Any swamps to be filled?

Mr. PADGETT. They have some swamp land that they mean to fill in for their purposes later on, but not at the present time.

Mr. MADDEN. The present proposed expenditure is to be $150,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the ultimate expenditure contemplated to be?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know of anything beyond what is provided here.

Mr. MADDEN. All the equipment is on the island that is necessary for the training of men now?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. Some is here provided for the training of the additional men.

Mr. MADDEN. How much?

Mr. PADGETT. For 12 additional barracks and 4 lavatories and mess halls, $6,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Here is a provision for reclaiming swamps. How much is that?

Mr. PADGETT. Thirty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. MADDEN. How much of the marsh land will that reclaim?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know just how much.

Mr. MADDEN. How about the sea wall?

Mr. PADGETT. That is to keep it from running back into the river. The dredging runs behind that.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose before we get through it will cost a million dollars.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no. The gentleman has his sights too high.

Mr. MADDEN. I know that everything we do costs about ten times as much as the gentleman says it will cost.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that item.

Mr. PADGETT. I hope the gentleman will not do that.

Mr. WALSH. There are several authorizations for the acquisition of land in very general language, and it seems to me that they are of sufficient importance to be made a subject of special legislation.

Mr. PADGETT. I will tell the gentleman frankly why we did not put the amount there. If the gentleman insists upon it, we will put the amount there, but the committee discussed the question. There are several places where it is authorized to acquire land. If we put the amount specified there, that goes as a sort of notice of the amount that is expected to be expended there; but if we authorize the acquisition of it without specifying in connection with the acquisition any definite amount, there is no notice to those people as to what Congress had set aside specially for that purpose. We have several places here where we have pursued that course, and put the amount, the aggregate, $680,000, I think, in appropriations for the President to pay for these several tracts that are to be acquired. One is at Newport, R. I., and another is at Lake Denmark.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts withhold his point of order a moment, please?

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will permit me to ask a question, possibly I may withdraw it. It says "the President is authorized to acquire under the provisions of this act." He has the authority here to acquire it by condemnation proceedings and pay over 75 per cent of what it is thought to be?

Mr. PADGETT. Exactly. That is the reason we put it in that form.

Mr. WALSH. That is on page 74.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. The gentleman will see that it reads:

> The President is hereby authorized and empowered, within the amounts herein appropriated therefor, to take over immediately for the United States possession of and title to each and all of the parcels of land, including appurtenances and improvements for the acquisition of which authority is herein granted and for which appropriations are herein made: Provided, That if said lands and appurtenances and improvements shall be taken over as aforesaid, the United States shall make just compensation therefor, to be determined by the President, and if the amount thereof so determined by the President is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to said 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, section 145, of the Judicial Code: Provided further, That upon the taking over of said property by the President as aforesaid the title to all property so taken over shall immediately vest in the United States.

That is the standardized form.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not somewhat unusual to make a blanket of authorization without fixing any limit of cost in the authorization?

Mr. PADGETT. I stated to the gentleman why we left that out.

Mr. WALSH. I know; and I can see the undesirability of including it in some specific instances; but I question whether it has been done heretofore, and whether it is the proper policy to give a blanket power to acquire land without a specific appropriation for the parcel sought to be acquired, and I doubt the wisdom of embarking upon a policy of making separate authorizations and covering them all with a blanket appropriation.

Mr. PADGETT. The limitation of it is contained in the amount of money that is appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH. There is no specific amount appropriated for this particular tract.

Mr. PADGETT. There is an amount appropriated for that and the others, three or four of them, including Lake Denmark.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; $680,000 is the blanket sum covering all these authorizations?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. If it is insisted upon, and if it is thought wiser, we can add right here the words "not to exceed $150,000."

Mr. BRITTEN. The committee considered that very carefully, and it was left out principally because we felt that if we specified $150,000 for this land to be purchased, the Government never in the world would pay less than $150,000, so that the land owners would hold the Government up and govern themselves accordingly. We took out the $150,000 and put in a blanket amount for that reason. I believe it is a protection to the Government, although I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that generally it is a bad practice.

Mr. WALSH. It has not been done before.

Mr. PADGETT. The committee considered that.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It has been done with reference to other appropriations.

Mr. WALSH. For the condemnation of land? Does the gentleman from Alabama state that this has ever been done before with a blanket sum?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think that lump sums of money have been placed in the hands of the President to expend for certain purposes, as in this case. He has recently bought a tract of land in the city of Washington out of a lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, he bought the Arlington Hotel out of an emergency fund which we gave him of $100,000,000, without any limitation or specific authorization, because that was appropriated as an emergency fund; but I doubt whether we have ever given the President authority to acquire property under the provisions of an act without fixing some amount of money to be applied to the land desired to be acquired, and I doubt if it is wise to embark upon that policy at the present time and to establish that precedent.

Mr. MADDEN. Let me say, if the gentleman will permit me right there, that the character of construction going on at the Arlington Hotel site is the cheapest of its type that I have ever seen anywhere in the history of all my experience.

Mr. WALSH. Probably that was why it was purchased.

Mr. BRITTEN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his point of order. On yesterday the Marine Corps was increased 150 per cent, and most of the recruits will go to Parris Island first. If you want to do something for the Marine Corps, withdraw your point of order, because this amendment will go in in the Senate if it is not put in here. It is very highly necessary. The committee considered very thoroughly the gentleman's particular objection to the paragraph, and decided that the interests of the Government would be the better conserved by doing it in the way we have.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the objection of my friend from Illinois is not well taken under the circumstances, for this reason: If this land was all held by one party, undoubtedly fixing the price at $150,000 would insure the Government paying that. But as I understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] this is held by a number of different parties. They can not get together and fix their prices——

Mr. BRITTEN. But they do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The President will undoubtedly do the best he can, and I think the limit ought to be fixed here.

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman from Massachusetts insists on it, I will offer an amendment to limit the appropriation.

Mr. WALSH. With that fact in mind, that the limit is to be fixed by an amendment, and because it is rather hard to resist the appeals and the propositions of the chairman of the committee and the other members in behalf of the Marine Corps, and the service which they represent and the rights which they so ably safeguard, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me state for the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts that if the House puts in a limitation of $1 it will not control the price, and an appropriation of $1,000,000 will not do it. Do you remember how this House, after two days discussion, limited the price of Jamestown to $1,200,000?

Mr. PADGETT. Under condemnation, of course, we can not limit the price.

Mr. BUTLER. Did we not provide an appropriation of $1,200,000 for Jamestown, and did they not pay over $1,400,000, under the method employed by the present administration for the purpose of condemning land?

Mr. WALSH. That is because we gave them authority to condemn it and to pay 75 per cent and let them go into court for the rest.

Mr. BUTLER. But you appoint commissioners, and the commissioners fix the price, and the Government then pays the price so fixed.

Mr. WALSH. I trust the gentleman is not blaming me.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course I am not blaming the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania says "You appoint the commissioners." Whom does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not mean that the gentleman from Massachusetts appoints the commissioners. I mean that when that method is adopted commissioners are appointed, and they fix the price, and then the Government may and usually does pay that price.

Mr. PADGETT. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire that I offer an amendment? If so, I am going to keep perfect good faith with him.

Mr. WALSH. I think the amendment ought to be offered.

Mr. PADGETT. All right. I will ask to add at the end of line 8, page 46, the words "and the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated for this purpose."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, at the end of line 8, add the words: "And the sum of $150,000 is hereby appropriated for this purpose."

Mr. PADGETT. Or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment as read will be modified by adding the words stated by the gentleman from Tennessee. Without objection, the amendment as modified is agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The Chair did not put the negative side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair said "Without objection, the amendment as modified is agreed to," and there was no objection.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to correct the spelling of a word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 7, correct the spelling of the word "Paris" so as to read "Parris."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course, there are not two r's in Paris.

Mr. PADGETT. There may be when it is the name of a man. This is the name of the owner, and he spells it Parris, and it is known in the local history as Parris Island.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, the question came up a few moments ago as to the cost of the reconstruction of the Naval Academy, and I sent for the Navy Yearbook. This work of reconstruction was begun under my predecessor, Hon. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, who was chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee. The limit of cost fixed in the act of June 7, 1900, was $8,000,000, and that was increased in the act of July 1, 1902, to $10,000,000 for the reconstruction of the Naval Academy. I may say that for myself I was not in sympathy with the style of architecture for that institution which was decided upon. I was favorable to the rebuilding of the Naval Academy in brick and stone with a colonial style of architecture.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, let me add this, that it is commonly understood that the original contract, with the extensions and improvements that have been made up to the last six or eight years, have cost the Government between $13,000,000 and $14,000,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, on page 46, line 4, I desire to have the spelling of the word "shrubbery" corrected. An "r" was left out.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will correct the spelling of the word.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy yard, Charleston, S. C.: For the dredging of the basin at the navy yard and the dredging of a channel from the navy yard to deep water beyond the jetties of a depth of 40 mean low tide and a width of 1,000 feet to provide a sufficient depth of water for proper use of the large dry dock herein authorized (limit of cost $5,000,000), $1,000,000, and for the construction of a large dry dock (limit of cost $4,000,000), $1,150,000; dredging, to continue, $25,000; railroad system extension, $15,000; toward water-front improvements, $200,000; boat storage, $10,000; in all, $2,400,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a preferential matter to an amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that portion of the paragraph from the beginning down to the comma after the figures "$1,000,000," in line 15.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I was just about to move to strike that out. The gentleman can make the point of order and it will be the same thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee concedes the point of order?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and it is stricken from the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I was somewhat at a loss as to how this provision struck out got in this paragraph, as it evidently comes under the jurisdiction of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. It was all gone over at the time that bill was under consideration. A moment ago my friend from Ohio was speaking of the fact that when we had small appropriations under consideration there was apt to be a considerable discussion and a very large attendance, a fact to which I have called attention myself on previous occasions. I do not know whether my friend was present at the time this provision for Charleston Harbor was gone over when the rivers and harbors appropriation bill was under consideration. If he was, he noted the attendance in the House at that time. Far be it from me to intimate that there was any combination between the Members from New York who wanted to have New York Harbor deepened and the Members from the Southern States who wanted to have the channel at Charleston deepened and extended and those that wanted also to have the harbor at Key West extended, but for some reason, by a most remarkable coincidence, there was at that time a large and full attendance of the gentlemen from those sections, both North and South, and also by a further remarkable coincidence they hung together very strongly when this matter came up for a vote on the passage of the amendments.

Mr. FOSS. And they are here now?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Some of them are here now. Not many, because we have reached a stage where they have this provision strongly intrenched in the rivers and harbors appropriation bill. I hope the body at the other end of the Capitol will do something with it, for, although it seems to be abandoned for the present, I think it will be necessary to keep watch upon it. This provision ought not to be in any bill, in this or any other, because it is not a war measure.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Did the gentleman express the hope that the Senate would do something with it or to it?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I accept the gentleman's amendment—something to it. That is what ought to be done, in my opinion. At a time like this, when we are at war, it seems to me we ought not to have any ground for suspicion that there are any combinations for the purpose of logrolling or ship getting or harbor deepening. The time for that ought to have passed long ago. If we are ever to do away with it, we ought to do away with it now, in this extremity of war, when all other considerations ought to be dropped and local matters entirely forgotten.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I understood the point of order was made down to and including the figures "$1,000,000" in line 15, leaving the word "and" in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the way the Chair understands it.

Mr. PADGETT. Then, I move to strike out the word "and" and also the comma before that word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 15, strike out the comma and the word "and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, also the word "for" ought to be spelled with a capital letter, and I ask that the Clerk be authorized to make that change.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, also I desire to correct the total. In line 19, page 46, I move to strike out the figures "$2,400,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,400,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 19, strike out the figures "$2,400,000" and insert "$1,400,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee whether the improvements authorized in this paragraph were included within the recommendations of any one of the reports of the Helm Commission?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; the Helm Commission recommended that the yard should be made a first-class yard, and they stated that there were various improvements needed there, and suggested that the details of them be worked out by the offices in the proper bureaus, but these are not submitted in any part of the Helm Board report. They come as the recommendations of the department, independent of the Helm Board.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman further state when these improvements are expected to be completed and the yard to be in condition to be used?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, the yard is being used now, very largely and very actively, and this is just as it is at various other yards where we are making improvements for water-front, boat storage, railroad systems, extensions, and things of that kind. The gentleman will notice just below in the bill there is the Key West station improvement, $25,000, and the naval station at New Orleans, for a floating crane and the improvements in the central power plant and distributing system, water-front improvements, etc. All those matters are recommendations that come from the department, customarily, from year to year, as the developments are needed, just as we had up a few moments ago in respect to the power plant at Annapolis. These are not parts of the Helm Board report. The committee has not taken up for consideration the Helm Board report, because they have not completed their work.

Mr. ELSTON. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. PADGETT. And the department has not taken up consideration of the Helm Board report.

Mr. ELSTON. What I want to get at from the chairman is that the improvements authorized in this paragraph are not in contravention of the statement made by the Secretary of the Navy and intimations made to me by the chairman of this committee that none of the recommendations of the Helm Commission covering either the Atlantic, Gulf, or Pacific coasts are to be taken up for legislation during the present session.

Mr. PADGETT. Not at all, sir. These are the ones that come customarily in the class and character and type of improvements along the line of natural development of the yard and would have been made if there had never been a Helm Board report or if there had never been a Helm Board created, and it has nothing to do and is not dependent upon and is not brought in because of the Helm Board report.

Mr. ELSTON. Can the gentleman state, if he knows, when it is expected to take up any of the projects covered by any of the reports of the Helm Commission?

Mr. PADGETT. Not this session of Congress; and whether they will next session is a matter that I do not care to prophesy about so far in advance. The Helm Board has not yet completed its investigation. My idea is that the Helm Board recommendations, as recommendations of that board, will not be taken up until after the conclusion of this war.

Mr. ELSTON. The Helm Commission reported that the present navy-yard facilities on the Pacific coast should be trebled. They show that the Pacific coast yards have only one-fourth the capacity of the Atlantic coast yards. If major fleet operations should occur on the Pacific coast the present yards could take care of only one-fourth of the necessary requirement for berthing and dry docks and for repair and supply. Does not the gentleman believe that a large project, like the proposed naval base on San Francisco Bay, involving at least six years for completion, should be commenced soon?

Mr. PADGETT. That might be over there and that might come through the department as departmental recommendations independent of the Helm report or a report.

Mr. ELSTON. Using the Helm report as a basis for details or for advisory purposes?

Mr. PADGETT. For advisory purposes; yes, sir.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs a question or two. Is this the first time this item has been ever carried with regard to the dry dock at Charleston, S. C.?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir. In the bill two years ago, I believe it was, or last year, there was an amendment inserted by the Senate to enlarge the existing dock that is there and make it a thousand feet long. The conferees on the part of the House would not stand for that, because that would not have been a usable dock; the depth was not sufficient. That dock is about 30 or 31 feet over the sills. This one will be 42 feet over the sills. This is the first time a dock of this kind has been proposed there, but there is an amendment in the former bill to lengthen the dock and make it a thousand feet, but not to deepen it, and it would not have been usable for the purpose for which it was intended.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This is intended to accompany the provision passed in the river and harbor bill the other day?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is there any limit on the cost of this dock?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; $4,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How is that limit provided; simply provided by the brackets here?

Mr. PADGETT. It is provided like it is always provided; like every limit of cost that is inserted in the naval bill or the other bill, it says the limit of cost shall be $4,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I ask the gentleman, frankly, does that mean anything at all?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; it means they can not exceed it without authority of Congress. They have to come to Congress to exceed it.

Mr. BUTLER. But they have often come?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. And we have never denied them?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In this case they will come?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know. We authorized two similar docks, one at Philadelphia and one at Norfolk, and they are being built under contract and within the limit of three and a half million dollars. This is $500,000 more than the limit of cost at Philadelphia or at Norfolk. Those two are being built under the limit of cost, and I am not prepared to say that this one will exceed the $4,000,000 provided here; but the gentleman knows, as well as anybody knows, what the state of public sentiment is about wages, about the labor situation, the material situation, and so forth.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, I may not remember correctly, but I do not think I ever remember an original proposition involving such a large amount as this with the limit of cost being fixed merely by brackets.

Mr. PADGETT. Always fixed that way.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And by no other provision.

Mr. PADGETT. We fixed it exactly as we did in reference to Norfolk, and just exactly that way for Philadelphia, and just exactly that way for Pearl Harbor.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As an original proposition?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; as an original proposition.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How large a ship is it expected the dock will care for?

Mr. PADGETT. Any ship that will go through the Panama Canal.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not arise to seek information about any of the provisions of this bill, but only for the purpose of expressing my earnest hope that we will be able to pass this important and needed legislation before we adjourn to-day. I was greatly impressed this morning by the receipt of a postal card containing a statement made by the late Ambassador Joseph H. Choate, one of the most eminent lawyers in the United States, three days before he died, a parting appeal to us all, containing these words, "For God's sake, hurry up!" I have not sought to consume any of the valuable time of this House in a discussion of the provisions of the pending bill, but I wish now to earnestly appeal to every Member on both sides of the House to bear in mind the far-reaching importance of immediate and favorable action upon every one of these war measures. Such a course upon our part will have a splendid effect throughout America, and it will reach beyond the seas. If there ever was a time since the declaration of war when all the American people, led by the example of their chosen Representatives in Congress, should hurry, should speed up, that time is now of all times.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to ask my friend whether, in view of the record of this Congress at the extra session and so far at this session in the granting of money and power in every case where it was asked, that message had not been more properly sent to another branch of this Government rather than to the legislative branch?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am not here to criticize another branch of Congress.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I said another than the legislative branch.

Mr. AUSTIN. I will not, during the period of the war, in a public manner seek to embarrass or to criticize the war administration while our boys are on the battle line fighting the Kaiser. [Applause.]

If I have a complaint from any constituent, I take it to the head of the proper department and submit it; and I have never failed to have the complaint promptly and satisfactorily attended to. Even the appearance of a division in sentiment in or out of Congress deserves criticism, and general faultfinding will not strengthen the American cause, and will not aid us either at home or abroad. It will not encourage our boys in France, but will give comfort to the enemy.

I believe it is the duty of every Senator and every Member of the House of Representatives to first take his grievances or complaints to the proper department of the Government and insist upon a remedy, a correction, or a satisfactory explanation first before there shall be any public criticism. [Applause.]

If the present administration were Republican and a President of that political faith Commander in Chief and both branches of Congress in sympathy with him, I know as a Republican that I would condemn a criticism here before the complaints were submitted to the heads of the departments for explanation or correction. I believe this the correct and proper course to pursue when the country is at war fighting for its very existence, for its life.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My friend is thoroughly aware of the fact that this is an appropriation for the year beginning the 30th of next June and ending one year from that time, and therefore I am at a loss to understand the application of the gentleman's remarks to this bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there are many, many items within the covers of this bill that are made immediately available, calling for the expenditure of thousands and millions of dollars.

Mr. WALSH. Only as deficiency items.

Mr. AUSTIN. They are made immediately available. The money is needed now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUSTIN. In this bill there are numerous provisions requiring the immediate use of money, and the closing paragraph says, "All appropriations contained in this act are hereby made immediately available." The members of the Naval Committee, who have the absolute confidence and respect of every Member of this House, have brought in a unanimous report, and there is not to-day a better nor a more efficient administration in this Government than that of the Navy Department. The highest type of men are directing its affairs, and up to this good hour no man here or elsewhere has dared, during this war, to criticize the administration of the Navy Department. The officials of that department have asked for these sums of money to be made immediately available to carry forward the great work of the Navy to achieve victory. Let us speed up and hasten action. Let us do it to-day, and not carry this important bill over another week to permit an unnecessary debate to continue here, when every particle of the information desired can be obtained personally from the members of the Naval Committee or from reading the printed report or the exhaustive hearings.

Do we not believe in the honor, the ability, the fidelity, and the loyalty of the members of the Naval Committee? Have they ever done anything to forfeit our high opinion and our complete confidence in them? They know the great burden of responsibility upon them is equal almost to that placed upon the membership of the Committee on Military Affairs; and those of us not upon this committee, charged with the duty of examining and passing upon these numerous items can trust them, and our trust will not be abused or betrayed.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Would my friend be willing to suspend the rules and pass the bill without reading? If the committee is to give all the information without anyone asking questions here on the floor of the House, why not suspend the rules and pass the bill at once?

Mr. AUSTIN. If the Navy Department and this great committee should say that the imperative interests of America demanded such a course, I would cheerfully do it.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman differs from most of the Members of the House, who feel responsibility for this legislation.

Mr. AUSTIN. We ask thousands of questions, we offer many amendments, valuable time is consumed, and never a change of a line in the bill, not the dotting of an "i" nor the crossing of a "t."

Mr. KEATING. We put two "r's" in Parris.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Does the gentleman recall that the bill was not discussed at all under general debate? We began it yesterday, and have gone pretty nearly two-thirds of the way through it. I do not think I have heard a single word of discussion on the floor that was not pertinent to the items of the bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; and nothing has been accomplished except to delay the passage of the bill. It was a fortunate thing that we dispensed with the general discussion, but we have practically had the general debate under the five-minute rule. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I move to strike out the paragraph as it now stands.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to strike out the paragraph, and is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect that my motion will prevail, but I want the record made, and if no one else feels inclined to support it, I am going to vote for it.

When this same matter was up the other day, while the House was considering the rivers and harbors bill, quite a full discussion was had of the merits of this proposition. It is not necessary to rehash the matter again, especially after the very bitter arraignment of the membership of the House to which we have just listened. In that connection I am fully justified in saying—for the facts bear out the statement—that the House of Representatives will pass this bill appropriating more money in the same length of time than any legislative body has ever appropriated on a similar proposition before in the history of the world. [Applause.] I do not believe this committee merits quite the castigation to which it has just listened. But I want to refer to this just for a moment, notwithstanding the words of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN]. I can not find out that this proposed improvement has any possible bearing on the war program. The earliest date to which we can look for the completion of the project so that it may be used at all is 30 months, and very likely the time will be very much greater than that. If the war is not over in 30 months, it will hardly ever end. It can not be justified on the ground that this is a war emergency. There is absolutely nothing on earth to justify it.

In that connection I want to call attention to the letter that was sent here and read to the House, which said that this project would not be completed within 30 months, and ended by saying that it is a war emergency and therefore ought to be passed. When advice comes to us in that language and in that contradictory fashion our faith in the sources of that advice is very apt to be somewhat shaken. I believe this is a proposition that never ought to have been considered in the river and harbor bill and never ought to be considered here now. If this proposition has merit it should be taken up and considered in connection with the general improvements to be provided for when the House acts on the various items in the report of the Helm committee.

I make no claim to any great knowledge of naval affairs, but I have had opportunity to journey somewhat over the world and I have conversed many times with the leading thinkers in our Navy, and I have never yet found one—I have talked with several on the subject—whose judgment approved this scheme. They do say that an important naval base should be completed in the West Indies. Then, if we are going to build a naval base anywhere, why should we not take up the proposition of building one there? They tell me that the greatest need of the American Navy, outside of the immediate exigencies of this war, is the construction of a great naval base at Guam. I am surprised that the great Naval Committee of this House has never taken up the proposition of the improvement at Guam as an item in the great naval program; but that has never been done. Nor have they taken up the proposition of building a great naval base in the West Indies. The only thing that has been brought up here is this scheme for first digging a river into a part of South Carolina and then at the end of it constructing a great dry dock and a base for certain naval purposes. Frankly, that does not commend itself to my judgment, nor does it commend itself strongly to my enthusiasm for the naval program. But as I said in the beginning, the game is all but won, and there is no doubt as to which is the winning side. Several years ago, when I had an opportunity personally to see this situation there, I was amazed to think that it had ever been started. But it has been started, and has progressed to a point where now it is to be enormously enlarged. But for my own satisfaction I want the opportunity of making the motion to strike this out and to vote for that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is this motion?

The CHAIRMAN. It is a motion to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I notice, in line 18, page 46, there is proposed an appropriation of $200,000 toward—I call attention to the word "toward"—water-front improvements. How far toward these improvements would $200,000 go?

Mr. PADGETT. My recollection is that it is estimated that it would take more than $1,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the nature of the improvement?

Mr. PADGETT. It is a sea wall—holding walls and berthing walls.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, the question asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] moves me to say this: The item is passed. It is going to stay in the bill. I make the prediction that we have begun at this point a program which will cost this Government $25,000,000 before it is completed. Now, mark my words. The gentleman just now developed $1,000,000, and it is not a war item. The history of the construction of dry docks in the United States shows they require from five to seven years in which to complete them. This is not in any sense whatever a war measure. It has nothing to do with the war. I did not even vote against it myself, but I want Congress and the country to understand what it is doing.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am astonished that, after listening to the admonition of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], who is himself a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, should have arisen here and questioned the wisdom of so much as a single provision of the bill. It is deeply to be regretted that the eminent patriot and lecturer from Tennessee failed to convince the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] that the Committee on Naval Affairs is infallible and entitled to bring in a bill which includes a multitude of items and appropriates almost one and one-half billions of dollars and to have it passed without a question. Mr. Chairman, I never have heard—and this I say with entire respect for my friend from Tennessee—I never in debate here have heard a more utterly ridiculous, indefensible proposition advanced by any man, no matter what his condition [laughter], than was the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, who, pointing his finger at you and me, demanded not only that we pass this bill carrying this vast sum, but also that we pass it without stopping to ask any question as to any item.

The proposition is nothing short of amazing. Can we honestly, under our oaths, thus surrender our votes to committee dictation when we legislate on great subjects for the people of the United States? No. We take oath to do our duty as we see it, not as any committee may see it. I have great respect for the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs; but any man who so absolutely surrenders to a committee that he is willing, without having a question asked, to vote a billion and a half of taxes upon the people of the United States does, in my judgment, forget his oath and his duty to his constituents and the country; for I have seen committees make serious mistakes. I have seen great committees strongly recommend important bills which, after earnest, thorough debate, were defeated, and I have seen subsequent events vindicate the judgment of the House in repudiating the judgment of the committee.

But the gentleman from Tennessee insists, in effect, that this tremendous sum should be voted without a word of inquiry. What sort of a proposition is this which he makes? Why, only two pages further on in this bill is a matter that ought to be very thoroughly debated and defeated. Look on page 48. It occupies the entire page. It is a proposition to give to the Secretary of the Navy complete authority to permit an unnamed railroad company to build a railroad into this city and to have its terminus at an unmentioned place anywhere in Washington or the District that he or the unnamed railroad company may decide to locate it. Did the gentleman from Tennessee know about that? Did he purposely reserve his admonition, his eloquence, until just before we reach that proposition, and then say rush this bill through without inquiring further about it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, let us make some progress. I want simply to say that the committee is not courting or inviting encomium, neither is it asking to avoid criticisms. Let us get ahead with the bill. That is all the committee is asking.

Mr. LONGWORTH. "For God's sake, hurry up!"

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to get through with the bill and go after a couple of Huns to-morrow or next day. Nobody here wants to be shot.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is uneasy for fear I may forget my oath of office. I want to make this public acknowledgment that the only time since I have been a Member of this House, in 10 years, that I forgot my country's interests was when I followed him on the McLemore resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, that is going to open a wide discussion and may involve some of the rest of us. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; many of us.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] led many of us on this side into a trap.

Mr. BUTLER. Why does the gentleman follow him or any one else? I do not follow anybody.

Mr. AUSTIN. I was led into a trap by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], and I shall never follow him again, or anybody.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. PADGETT. Let us read.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I wish it were the regular order to reply to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that debate on this paragraph has long since expired.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, in order to expedite the passage of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval Proving Ground, Indianhead, Md.: Improvements to powder factory, $140,000; pyro storage, $20,000; in all, $160,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to strike from the bill without reading the provision on page 48.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman please state why he does that?

Mr. PADGETT. I understand that other arrangements have been made to build the railroad. I understand the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. is going to build a road on its own account down there.

Mr. BUTLER. That is the railroad proposition.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to strike from the bill, without reading it, all of page 48. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval magazine, Fort Mifflin, Pa.: The President is authorized to acquire under the authority and provisions of this act additional land for increasing ordnance facilities in the vicinity of the naval magazine, Fort Mifflin, Pa.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, the same thing applies here. The estimate of that is $360,000, and if the gentleman wants I will insert that by amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his point of order, and the gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. After the end of the paragraph insert "and for this purpose $360,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] to strike out include all of the paragraph on page 48?

The CHAIRMAN. The entire page.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is the one to which I called attention.

Mr. PADGETT. That is it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 49, line 5, after the word "Pennsylvania," insert the following: "and for this purpose $360,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, just a question. What is proposed to be done?

Mr. PADGETT. It is to acquire land there for the storage of high explosives, to enlarge the magazine. We are getting a tremendous amount of powder and high explosives on hand, and we have to have somewhere to store them, and when the war is over they will be taken off in large quantities from the ships in commerce and also from our fighting ships, and we have not any place to store them; and this is for the purpose of enlarging the magazine at Fort Mifflin.

Mr. CANNON. Well, the gentleman has investigated it and he thinks that the appropriation ought to be made. Of course we now are constructing under other bills storage facilities in New York?

Mr. PADGETT. They are for merchandise, for food, clothing, and so forth.

Mr. CANNON. And also at Philadelphia.

Mr. PADGETT. We are providing for acquiring additional land at Philadelphia, next to Fort Mifflin, which comes right next down below there. We want land there. I have a statement here that is strictly confidential, because gentlemen can see the necessity of not publishing how much we have stored at different places.

Mr. CANNON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PADGETT. I would be willing to show it to any Member of the House as a confidential statement showing the enormous amount stored and being manufactured at a greater speed than ever before.

Mr. CANNON. Many bills have carried similar appropriations?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; it is quite common.

Mr. CANNON. I think perhaps in the sundry civil bill, and certainly in two deficiency bills, we carried very large amounts for storage.

Mr. PADGETT. Not for the Navy, I think.

Mr. CANNON. Probably the gentleman is correct, but for the Army.

Mr. PADGETT. I think so; yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Well, the gentleman knows more about it than I do. I merely asked for information.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee two or three questions?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. He will recall this is one of the items in the bill that gave the Committee on Naval Affairs a good deal of concern lest we might be held up for exorbitant and extravagant prices. Before this land shall be acquired by the Government will the gentleman ask the authorities in the Navy Department to examine with care the eastern end of that island, which is known as League Island, to see whether it will be possible to put these magazines at that end of the island and avoid being held up, which I believe may be the fate of the Government.

Mr. PADGETT. I have a statement of the Secretary of the Navy in relation to that, and I have a letter here from him in which he states that it would not do, that it would not be possible to store the high explosives in large quantities upon the navy yard where we have millions and millions invested in manufacture, and with six, eight, or ten thousand men working every day and night in the year.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, that is all very handsome and very pretty as the Secretary of the Navy sends it, but I know something about this. If these magazines can be located at the eastern end of the island, they will be further away from humanity than where it is proposed to locate them, which is just across the Schuylkill River, a short distance from the shops of the League Island Navy Yard, while the other end of the tract must be a mile or a mile and a half away. I propose to walk over the island and propose to have that measured. I intend to know whether or not that is the proper place to put these magazines. It may put the naval officers to a little more trouble in reference to hauling, but I intend to see. I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee; it is absolutely necessary to have some place where those high explosives can be stored and not endanger every life in the city of Philadelphia, as I contend it would from the location as I understand it. I may change my mind about it after I walk over it in a few days, but from all I can see we will have less danger from explosions, less danger to human life, by putting these magazines at the other end of the island.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. I have no desire to enter into any controversy with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], but his remarks lead me to observe that if he is the character of statesman that he would have us believe, from the argument that he has advanced here he is lacking in that degree of courage and sound judgment which I, for one, heretofore had attributed to him, because I have never seen anything in his career here in the House—and it has been somewhat long, and during all that time it has been honorable—to indicate that he stood in fear of postal cards.

However much we might agree with the statement expressed upon the postal cards, I doubt if it would be wise for Congress to discontinue its labors and return to our homes and allow the Government to be conducted by postal-card edicts, sent out by people who utterly lack intelligent information or intimate knowledge upon the tremendous problems that are being legislated upon here in this Congress by reason of the war emergency.

It is easy to adopt or reiterate a phrase that was uttered some 11 or 12 months ago, the dying words of a former distinguished ambassador, the Hon. Joseph H. Choate, and to seek to apply it to the conditions that exist to-day. But let me direct the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee and the attention of the writers of those cards to the fact that since those words were uttered May 11, 1917, this Congress has hurried up, it has speeded up, and we have met every test, and there is nobody among those who are writing these messages who can point out a single project or proposition of legislation that is at the present time held up by Congress or being purposely delayed, or that is crippling the arm of this Government in the prosecution of this great war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WALSH. I yield for a question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not the gentleman know, and every Member of the House know, that it will not make a particle of difference whether this bill is passed to-day or passed some time next week, so far as any operations of the Government are concerned?

Mr. WALSH. I think that is true, although there may be one or two appropriations which are to be made immediately available, which the department may require in the near future. But a day or two, I assure the gentleman, would make no great difference.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is not any of them that has not money now.

Mr. WALSH. I think so. Another thing, Mr. Chairman, I think my colleague from Tennessee has become somewhat famous, if I may use the term, for looking with favor upon any measure carrying an appropriation, and the larger the appropriation the greater is his glee in voting for it. And so here we have a bill of $1,350,000,000 or more, which he seeks to jam through without question or discussion, because of his confidence in the Committee on Naval Affairs. If that be the standard to be followed, where would the draft law have been when it was taken up?

I deny that I sought to hinder or delay. I have asked questions, as have others, including members of the Committee on Naval Affairs, because I believe I have the right to know, before voting on these projects, as has every Member of the House. Fortunately I know I am not responsible to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee for my acts here upon the floor, nor need I answer to the great constituency which he represents so well and faithfully. I have listened to him in the past, and I think he is a master at bestowing verbal tributes and encomiums upon committees and chairmen for the faithful performance of their work, and I have joined him heretofore, and I join him now, in thinking that this great committee deserves praise for its work.

But neither the chairman of the committee nor any member of the committee, so far as I have been able to ascertain, has intimated or asked that Members sit silent and allow this bill to be read through from the first to the last line without asking questions or seeking information or debating the merits of proposed changes in legislation. I have made points of order against legislation upon this bill because it is contrary to the rules of the House, and in several, if not all, instances, upon the urgency being explained, upon information being given. I have withdrawn those points of order; and I have no apology to make to my colleagues nor to the writers of these postal cards from here and yon throughout the country for anything that I have said or done or failed to say or do upon this measure, nor do I believe such a course is disloyal. I believe the country will be better satisfied if we see to it that this legislation is carefully considered and passed than it would be if we see to it that it is carelessly and hurriedly passed, because we have all seen very often the result of hurried legislation. It requires, later on, remedial legislation, and only results in protracting the session sometimes which it is sought to shorten.

I feel that mayhap some of the desires of some gentlemen to hurry this session and adjourn may be inspired by the fact that in the weeks to come, or in the not very far distant future, there is to be an election or a primary and that possibly some campaigning may be required. I do not think that emergency, even together with the postal cards, ought to frighten us into haste and ill-considered legislation, and I challenge the assertion that Congress is deserving of these contemptuous appeals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Navy yard, Puget Sound, Wash.: Improvements, central power plant and distributing systems, $200,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves a point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. That is the same as the other. The amount is $18,000. I will offer an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval magazine, Lake Denmark, N. J.: The President is authorized to acquire under the authority and provisions of this act additional land for increasing ordnance facilities in the vicinity of the naval magazine, Lake Denmark, N. J.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee proposes an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. PADGETT. Page 49, at the end of line 14, add "and for this purpose there is appropriated $18,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PADGETT: Page 49, line 14, after the words "New Jersey," insert the following: "and for this purpose $18,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Torpedo station, Newport, R. I., buildings: Boathouse and diving school, $100,000; emergency torpedo repair shop, $100,000; extension of industrial roads, $20,000; extension of sea wall, $5,000; rebuilding carpenter shop, $25,000; in all, $250,000.

The President is authorized to acquire under the authority and provisions of this act additional land for increasing ordnance facilities in the vicinity of the naval torpedo station, Newport, R. I.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that—the same point.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that the island item?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; the island at Newport.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice that part of this appropriation is for a diving school. Does that mean anything more than a swimming pool?

Mr. PADGETT. It is where the deep-sea divers are educated. We had some divers who went from there who broke the world's record in raising the F-boat in Pearl Harbor.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. With diving apparatus?

Mr. PADGETT. With diving apparatus; and this is for the training of the divers.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts withdraws his point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PADGETT: Page 49, line 23, after the words "Rhode Island," insert the following: "And for this purpose "$100,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval training station (Illinois) buildings: Dredging harbor, $35,000.

Mr. PADGETT. I offer an amendment after line 18.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 50, line 18, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"The President is authorized to acquire, under the authority and provisions of this act, additional land for the enlargement of the naval training station, Great Lakes, Ill.; and for this purpose $887,500 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the language "is authorized to acquire, under the authority and provisions of this act," appears several times in this bill.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; there is a general authority given in a paragraph on page 74.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is what I wished to ask about.

Mr. PADGETT. It is to standardize language used in a number of bills that Congress has passed, authorizing the President to take over the title and the possession, to place a value upon the property and pay 75 per cent, or pay all of it, if they are satisfied with that price.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. This amendment calls for $887,000 to acquire land at the Great Lakes training station near Chicago?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Can the gentleman inform me whether this land is situated south or north of the Great Lakes station, and what the acreage of the same is, and whether a price has been agreed upon, and by whom?

Mr. PADGETT. No price has been agreed upon. It is to be taken over by the President under the authority of condemnation given him.

Mr. SABATH. How has the price of $880,000 been fixed on this land?

Mr. PADGETT. That is the estimate that has been put upon it as to the value of the land.

Mr. SABATH. Can the gentleman inform me by whom the estimate has been made?

Mr. PADGETT. By the officer in charge at the Great Lakes station and by inquiry and investigation at the department. They say that will cover it. I think there are something like 700 or 800 acres.

Mr. BRITTEN. There are 709½ acres.

Mr. SABATH. Has the gentleman a statement prepared showing the different prices that have been recommended?

Mr. PADGETT. I have a plat here that shows the acreage.

Mr. SABATH. Does it show the prices recommended for the various parcels of the property?

Mr. PADGETT. I have a plat here that shows the acreage and the estimated cost of each parcel.

Mr. BRITTEN. The plat very clearly shows the number of acres of the various parcels. It designates the owners and also shows the estimated prices at which these various pieces can be had. It indicates Foss Park, named after the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Foss], who was formerly chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

This park, owned by the city of North Chicago, is to be contributed to the Navy for its use indefinitely for a training station. I will say to my colleague [Mr. SABATH] that all of the land on which the present semipermanent buildings are located is to be purchased under this $887,000 appropriation, at prices varying from a little less than $1,000 an acre to a little less than $2,000 an acre, depending upon the location of the land, its proximity to Lake Michigan and the Bluff.

Mr. SABATH. I desire this information because I have been informed that certain prices for some of these parcels have been agreed upon that have been in excess of the actual value of the property.

Mr. PADGETT. I understand from the Secretary that no prices have been agreed upon.

Mr. SABATH. I am willing to concede that the Secretary of the Navy and the Navy Department have been at all times very careful in expending any money which we have appropriated. Nevertheless this matter coming as it did come to me, I thought it my duty to secure all the information that I possibly could, so that I can intelligently answer the inquiries that have been made of me.

If the gentleman has the statement here, and also the plat, the chances are that it will in a great measure aid me in satisfying some of these people.

Mr. PADGETT. I will be very glad to give the gentleman one of these plats. I have several of them. I will give the gentleman a blue print showing the land, the prices, and the acreage in the different parcels.

Mr. BRITTEN. And the owners.

Mr. SABATH. The owners, and the prices recommended so far?

Mr. PADGETT. The prices estimated.

Mr. SABATH. This appropriation will not authorize the immediate purchase at the prices estimated on this plat?

Mr. PADGETT. It does not fix any prices. It authorizes the President to take over the land. Congress has no authority to fix the price. The owners have the right to go into court if they are dissatisfied with the prices fixed by the President.

Mr. SABATH. That is what I desire to know, whether they are going to take the land without condemnation, notwithstanding the fact that it should be ascertained that the prices submitted were altogether too high.

Mr. PADGETT. The President is given the power to fix the price himself, and if it is agreeable to them and they take it, he pays for it in full.

Mr. SABATH. Of course, the gentleman realizes that the President himself can not look after the values, but that somebody else does.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, he does it through a commission or a board, of course; but he must approve the finding of that commission.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the bill, on page 19, carries an item of $725,000 for this Great Lakes training station.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is for the maintenance of the present station.

Mr. PADGETT. That is for the training—the personnel.

Mr. FESS. This amount is for the increase?

Mr. BRITTEN. For the purchase of land now being used for training purposes?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Does this mean that the Great Lakes station is going to increase largely in the personnel later on?

Mr. PADGETT. They have between 25,000 and 30,000 there now. They have already turned out and sent into the service more than 30,000 men since the war began, and we are using these grounds now under a permissive license or a nominal lease. We have erected many millions of dollars' worth of buildings on the lands, and they need them. It is a station for the great Central West, where all of that section of the country send their men, and it is recommended that instead of scrapping the buildings and things when we need the ground that we go ahead and buy now and preserve the three or four million dollars that we have already expended.

Mr. BRITTEN. It is a fact that some seven or eight million dollars has already been expended on the land this appropriation is intended to purchase.

Mr SABATH. I understand that a great deal of work has been done there and that a great deal of good has been accomplished, and that a wonderful amount of work is being done now, and that this land is absolutely necessary. What I am interested in is that the price should be reasonable and that we should pay no more for the land than it is actually worth.

Mr. PADGETT. That will be safeguarded as far as possible to safeguard it under the Constitution.

Mr. SABATH. I have the utmost confidence in the gentleman who has charge and in a great majority of the men under him. Nevertheless, I want to know.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the payment of land herein authorized to be acquired by the President for the use of the Navy and Marine Corps and not herein specifically appropriated for, $628,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph, because we have already carried those appropriations under various items.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 51, strike out all of lines 1, 2, and 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, at this time I ask unanimous consent to change the totals, and I will hand the correct amount to the Clerk when we ascertain it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to change the total when the chairman has determined the amount it should be. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent, Bureau of Medicine and Surgery: For tolls and ferriages; care, transportation, and burial of the dead, including officers and enlisted men who die within the United States; purchase of books and stationery, binding of medical records, unbound books, and pamphlets; hygienic and sanitary investigation and illustration; sanitary and hygienic instruction; purchase and repairs of nonpassenger-carrying wagons, automobile ambulances, and harness; purchase of and feed for horses and cows; purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of two passenger-carrying motor vehicles for naval dispensary, Washington, D. C., and of one motor-propelled vehicle for official use only for the medical officer on out-patient medical service at the Naval Academy, and of a motor omnibus for the transportation of convalescent patients and attendants at the Naval Hospital at Las Animas, Colo., to be used only for official purposes; trees, plants, care of grounds, garden tools, and seeds; incidental articles for the Naval Medical School and naval dispensary, Washington, naval medical supply depots, sick quarters at Naval Academy and marine barracks; washing for medical department at Naval Medical School and naval dispensary, Washington, naval medical supply depots, sick quarters at Naval Academy and marine barracks, dispensaries at navy yards and naval stations, and ships; and for minor repairs on buildings and grounds of the United States Naval Medical School and naval medical supply depots; rent of rooms for naval dispensary, Washington, D. C., not to exceed $1,200; for the care, maintenance, and treatment of the insane of the Navy and Marine Corps on the Pacific coast, including supernumeraries held for transfer to the Government Hospital for the Insane; for dental outfits and dental material, and all other necessary contingent expenses; in all, $1,500,000.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I think at this time it might be interesting to say to the House that the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery of the Navy has practically fully equipped for medical purposes some 22 of the Army transports. That constitutes one of the important works of this bureau. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that up to the present time neither the Navy nor the Army has a single hospital ship.

Mr. PADGETT. The Navy has two.

Mr. BRITTEN. The Navy has purchased two steamers that are now being equipped as hospital ships.

Mr. PADGETT. The Navy had two before that.

Mr. BRITTEN. The Navy had the Solace, which was not a hospital ship but a makeshift. I am talking about a real hospital ship, such as the service has been demanding for 17 years, and finally by act of Congress more than a year ago we appropriated two and a half million dollars for a hospital ship, which is now being constructed at the Philadelphia Navy Yard. After a year from the date of authorization I find that it is 10 per cent completed. At that rate of progress it will take us 10 years to finish it. I agree that the construction has been set aside for work of greater importance.

I call attention to the fact that Congress authorized two and a half million dollars to build a real hospital ship, with a capacity for taking care of some 800 men; that is, 800 wounded, disabled, or sick soldiers. In the absence of that ship we have purchased two liners, at $2,240,000 each—practically what the other ship would have cost had it been completed—and these ships have a combined capacity of but 700 men, at a total cost of about $5,000,000.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not a fact that about the only real use for a hospital ship in the Navy, or even in the Army, is to transport the sick and wounded to a place where we have permanent marine or military hospitals?

Mr. BRITTEN. That is true.

Mr. McKENZIE. And is it not also a fact that the Surgeon General of the United States Army has testified that these great ocean liners, with but very little changes made in them, make first-class hospital ships for transporting our wounded?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; that is not the fact, because they can never afford proper facilities for amputating a leg or an arm. You might as well say——

Mr. McKENZIE. They have to have surgeons to do that.

Mr. BRITTEN. That you can remodel an old barn into a first-class hospital, and for that reason you will not provide a hospital until somebody gets sick or has his leg shot off——

Mr. McKENZIE. But is it not a fact that some of these great liners are actual floating palaces, far superior in equipment to any hospital?

Mr. BRITTEN. Superior in luxury, but the gentleman will agree that a perfectly plain sanitary operating room is more necessary.

Mr. McKENZIE. That can be easily put in.

Mr. PADGETT. Very easily put in.

Mr. BRITTEN. Not easily, adequately, or properly. What I am complaining about is this——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Speaking of transports, is it not the gentleman's understanding that we need these large liners for transport service instead of hospital ships?

Mr. BRITTEN. There is no question about it. The transport will be sunk at sight, whether there are sick men on it or not, and the hospital ship is protected by treaty.

Mr. PADGETT. That has not been our experience in this war.

Mr. BRITTEN. There is a military difference between the two characters of ships. Transports will be sunk at sight, while hospital ships should be free from attack.

A MEMBER. They do not seem to think so.

Mr. BRITTEN. We have an agreement to that effect, and until the central powers do not live up to it I will assume our hospital ships will not be sunk.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Hun ever live up to any agreement?

Mr. BRITTEN. All right; then let us agree that he will not live up to any agreement, but let us build a hospital ship as quickly as possible. If we do not need them, why are paying this $5,000,000?

Mr. BUTLER. The Huns would sink it.

Mr. BRITTEN. We should have had one long ago, but certain members of the committee and certain Members of the House who have been continually calling for an increase of the Naval Establishment have been voted down in their desires; and the present administration, until a year ago, although it had been in power four years or more and the great European war had been going on for three years, made no attempt whatever to provide proper hospital ships. That is what I am complaining of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, on page 52, line 7, reference is made to a naval dispensary, Washington, D. C. On the same page, line 15, reference is made to a naval dispensary, Washington. Is that the State of Washington?

Mr. PADGETT. Where is it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Line 15. Now in line 7 it refers to the naval dispensary, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PADGETT. The other is the State of Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the inquiry.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And in line 18 it refers to the State of Washington?

Mr. PADGETT. Naval medical school and naval dispensary, Washington. Yes, sir. They have one there and there is one out at Bremerton. They have a little dispensary at the navy yard and at Bremerton, that is part of the State of Washington; it is an island out there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I wanted to know where they were. The bill directly refers to Washington, in the District of Columbia, and there is no Washington in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PADGETT. They designate this, Washington, D. C., like they say, Washington Gun Factory, District of Columbia.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], has stated that we have purchased two ships for which we have paid four and a half million dollars and that these ships are constructed so as to provide hospital ships and fitted——

Mr. PADGETT. And fitted up for that.

Mr. SABATH. And fitted for that purpose because we could not build any ships and get them ready in the short space of time, but by acquiring these two ships they give us two hospital ships immediately without waiting for 10 years, as the gentleman tried to convey it would take to build new ones.

Mr. PADGETT. It would not have taken that long a time, but the Shipping Board requested that the building of hospital ships be postponed for more essential work and we purchased the two to meet the immediate necessities and fitted them out.

Mr. SABATH. And they are being fitted up for that purpose and have been recommended by experts that they can be used to good advantage as hospital ships?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, as I would like to reply to my colleague from Chicago [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. PADGETT. Let us make progress.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; after I use one minute. I think I ought to reply to my colleague from Chicago who says that I am complaining about the time it takes to construct ships. I wonder if my good friend realizes—and he is a very good friend of mine and a very good Democrat—I wonder if he realizes that this administration now in power has only authorized and commissioned one first-line fighting ship for the Navy as long as it has been in power. Does the gentleman know that?

Mr. SABATH. I realize one thing, that the Navy and this administration are doing everything under the sun to win the war——

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; but they had many days of rain when there was no sun——

Mr. SABATH. And without the assistance of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. Of all the ships authorized since the present administration came into office more than five years ago, only one first-line fighting ship has been put into active commission. Does the gentleman know that, and does he think that is making progress when the world is surrounded by fire and a great war is going on?

Mr. SABATH. This is the first complaint I have heard from anyone about the Navy Department that it is not making progress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FESS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to make a motion?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FESS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery connected with the Navy Department is acting in unison with that connected with the Army?

Mr. PADGETT. They are working together, and working harmoniously together. They have their conferences. They are, of course, under different organizations and under different authorities, but they are coordinating all of their work. They are consulting with each other, and they are working out their plans in conjunction, and the Army is turning over to the Navy the transportation of its wounded from the battlefields to this country.

Mr. FESS. This museum down on the Mall, the Physicians' and Surgeons' Museum, which is rather an Army institution, is said to have one of the finest libraries, one of the finest collections, that can be found anywhere in the world. Is that a part of the Navy as well as of the Army?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know, sir. I do not know as to that. I saw a little controversy about that in a paper the other day. I have never looked into it. There has never been any complaint from the officers as to whether they have a joint library or not. I do not know about that.

Mr. FESS. It was a matter of information that I was trying to get as to what was the resource of the Navy in this particular line.

Mr. PADGETT. They are working harmoniously and coordinating their work.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Transportation of remains: To enable the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to cause to be transferred to their homes the remains of officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, of members of the Nurse Corps, of civilian officers and crews of naval auxiliaries, and of officers and enlisted men of the Naval Militia and National Naval Volunteers and the Naval Reserve Force when on active service with the Navy, who die or are killed in action ashore or afloat, and also to enable the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to cause to be transported to their homes the remains of civilian employees who die outside of the continental limits of the United States, $350,000: Provided, That the sum herein appropriated shall be available for payment for transportation of the remains of officers and men who have died while on duty at any time since April 21, 1898, and shall be available until June 30, 1920.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MADDEN. I simply wanted to ask the chairman of the committee whether the men who are killed die or whether there is a separate case against the man who dies and the man who is killed?

Mr. PADGETT. How is that?

Mr. MADDEN. I see the language in this paragraph relates to the man who dies and the man who is killed, and I was wondering whether the man who is killed dies or whether the man who dies is killed, and whether there was a different case in each instance.

Mr. PADGETT. They both die, I will say to the gentleman, but in two different aspects. If you said "died" and said he was not killed, some fellow would raise a verbal technicality on it.

Mr. MADDEN. When a man is killed he is dead, and it does not make any difference whether he dies from a bullet wound or from natural causes. The same condition ought to apply.

Mr. PADGETT. The same conditions do apply, and that language has been used ever since I have been a member of the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. That does not seem to make it any more binding, if I may use the term, and it does not seem to make it any more necessary. It ought not to be in. Certainly that language ought not to be employed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Would it make any of them "deader"?

Mr. MADDEN. No; it makes no difference whether they die after being killed or die without being killed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Care of hospital patients: For the care, maintenance, and treatment of patients in naval and in other than naval hospitals, for the rental and purchase of land, at Key West, Fla., and at the naval training station, Great Lakes, $4,000,000.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. We would get along better if the chairman did not offer to amend the bill so much.

Mr. PADGETT. We are offering committee amendments. In these times conditions change very fast, and the committee must keep up with its work. I do not want to bring in an incomplete bill here and have it filled up with amendments made elsewhere.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, is this a committee amendment or an amendment offered by the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. It is a committee amendment. The Chair thinks it would be a proper way to have it read and then discuss it afterwards.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] keeps inquiring about these committee amendments. He does not know, apparently, that they were adopted by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair does not know what has happened in the committee. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PADGETT offers the following committee amendment: Page 53, after line 24, insert as a separate paragraph the following:

"United States Naval Hospital, Fort Lyons, Colo.: For the purchase of about 420 acres of land for the enlargement and development of the naval hospital, Fort Lyons, Colo., $19,600."

Mr. BUTLER. That is in regard to the tuberculosis hospital?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF SUPPLIES AND ACCOUNTS.

Pay of the Navy: Pay and allowances prescribed by law of officers on sea duty and other duty, and officers on waiting orders, $33,234,498; officers on the retired list, $3,374,391; commutation of quarters for officers on shore not occupying public quarters, including boatswains, gunners, carpenters, sailmakers, machinists, pharmacists, pay clerks, and mates, naval constructors, and assistant naval constructors, $2,821,248, and also members of Nurse Corps (female), $44,200; for hire of quarters for officers serving with troops where there are no public quarters belonging to the Government and where there are not sufficient quarters possessed by the United States to accommodate them, or commutation of quarters not to exceed the amount which an officer would receive were he not serving with troops, and hire of quarters for officers and enlisted men on sea duty at such times as they may be deprived of their quarters on board ship due to repairs or other conditions which may render them uninhabitable, $25,000; pay of enlisted men on the retired list, $540,255; extra pay to men reenlisting under honorable discharge, $1,400,000; interest on deposit by men, $15,000; pay of petty officers, seamen, landsmen, and apprentice seamen, including men in the engineers' force and men detailed for duty with the Fish Commission, 180,000 men, plus 24,000 apprentice seamen, plus 10,000 men for Aviation Service, plus 14,000 men in trade schools, and pay of enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, and for the pay of enlisted men detailed for duty with the Naval Militia, $121,630,172; pay of enlisted men undergoing sentence of court-martial, $540,000, and as many machinists as the President may from time to time deem necessary to appoint; and 24,000 apprentice seamen under training at training stations and on board training ships, at the pay prescribed by law, $8,019,600; pay of the Nurse Corps, $670,800; rent of quarters for members of the Nurse Corps, $55,800; retainer pay and active-service pay of members of the Naval Reserve Force, $55,091,982; in all, $227,372,946; and the money herein specifically appropriated for "Pay of the Navy" shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law as "Pay of the Navy," and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, on page 54, lines 22 and 23, I wish to offer an amendment to strike out the language that is duplicated in two places.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PADGETT offers the following amendment: Page 54, lines 22 and 23, strike out the words "plus 24,000 apprentice seamen."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. The language appears on that appropriation, and then it is on page 55, on lines 4 and 5. There is no use in having it in both places.

Mr. BUTLER. That is right.

Mr. FESS. On page 55, line 2, following the figures "$540,000," is the language "and as many machinists as the President may from time to time deem necessary to appoint." Has the gentleman an amendment of that?

Mr. PADGETT. That has always been the provision, and is an indefinite number that the President appoints for the Navy.

Mr. FESS. I do not understand the language "pay of enlisted men undergoing sentence of court-martial, $540,000, and as many machinists as the President may from time to time deem necessary to appoint." What is the meaning of that?

Mr. PADGETT. We have machinists who are enlisted men in the Navy, and there is no limitation upon the number.

Mr. FESS. There is no figure in the appropriation.

Mr. PADGETT. All of that is one fund, for all purposes embraced in it.

Mr. FESS. Including the $500,000?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; it is all one fund.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provisions, Navy: For provisions and commuted rations for the seamen and marines, which commuted rations may be paid to caterers of messes, in case of death or desertion, upon orders of the commanding officers, commuted rations for officers on sea duty (other than commissioned officers of the line, Medical and Pay Corps, chaplains, chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief carpenters, chief machinists, chief pay clerks, and chief sailmakers) and midshipmen, and commuted rations stopped on account of sick in hospital and credited at the rate of 50 cents per ration to the naval hospital fund; subsistence of officers and men unavoidably detained or absent from vessels to which attached under orders (during which subsistence rations to be stopped on board ship and no credit for commutation therefor to be given); subsistence of men on detached duty; subsistence of officers and men of the Coast Guard and Lighthouse Services while cooperating with the Navy in so far as the regular appropriations for these services are insufficient therefor; subsistence of officers and men of the naval auxiliary service; subsistence of members of the Naval Reserve Force during period of active service; and for subsistence of female nurses and Navy and Marine Corps general courts-martial prisoners undergoing imprisonment with sentences of dishonorable discharge from the service at the expiration of such confinement: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to commute rations for such general courts-martial prisoners in such amounts as seem to him proper, which may vary in accordance with the location of the naval prison, but which shall in no case exceed 30 cents per diem for each ration so commuted; and for the purchase of United States Army emergency rations as required; in all, $75,520,216, to be available until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the chairman of the committee please explain what is meant by "including rations for general courts-martial prisoners"?

Mr. PADGETT. Whenever a prisoner is court-martialed and he is put in prison, he is allowed so much per day for rations in the prison.

Mr. MADDEN. Is he allowed to buy his own rations there?

Mr. PADGETT. He could do it if he wanted to.

Mr. MADDEN. In the prison?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; or he could have it transferred to the prison, if he is in a naval prison; but if he is in another prison that ration is commuted. He may lose his pay and allowances under the court-martial sentence, and all of those fines and losses of pay and commutation of rations go to the naval pension fund.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does "commutation of rations" mean to give him the option of taking it in cash?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. The law fixes the price at 40 cents a day for his support.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts: For fuel; the removal and transportation of ashes and garbage from ships of war; books, blanks, and stationery, including stationery for commanding and navigating officers of ships, chaplains on shore and afloat, and for the use of courts-martial on board ships; purchase, repair, and exchange of typewriters for ships; packing boxes and materials; interior fittings for general storehouses, pay offices, and accounting offices in navy yards; expenses of disbursing officers; coffee mills and repairs thereto; expenses of naval clothing factory and machinery for the same; laboratory equipment; purchase of articles of equipage at home and abroad under the cognizance of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels therewith, and the manufacture of such articles in the several navy yards; musical instruments and music; mess outfits; soap on board naval vessels; athletic outfits; tolls, ferriages, yeomen's stores, safes, and other incidental expenses; labor in general storehouses, paymasters' offices, and accounting offices in navy yards and naval stations, including naval stations maintained in island possessions under the control of the United States, and expenses in handling stores purchased and manufactured under "General account of advances"; and reimbursement to appropriations of the Department of Agriculture of cost of inspection of meats and meat food products for the Navy Department: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for chemists and for clerical, inspection, storeman, store laborer, and messenger service in the supply and accounting departments of the navy yards and naval stations and disbursing offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, shall not exceed $4,000,000; in all, $17,836,625.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, on page 58, line 3, there is a misprint. I want to strike out the word "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "nineteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PADGETT: Page 58, line 3, strike out the word "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "nineteen."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. On page 56, in line 25, the word "transportation" is misspelled. It ought to be corrected.

Mr. PADGETT. It is correct in the print I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk says it is incorrect in the copy of the bill which he is reading.

Mr. PADGETT. Then I ask that that be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fuel and transportation: Coal and other fuel for steamers' and ships' use, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same; maintenance and general operation of machinery of naval fuel depots and fuel plants; water for all purposes on board naval vessels; and ice for the cooling of water, including the expense of transportation and storage of both, $48,400,000: Provided, That when, in the opinion of the President, the prices asked for the charter of vessels for the transportation of fuel are excessive, he is authorized to purchase vessels suitable for the purpose, and, if money is not otherwise available, to pay for them from the appropriation "Fuel and transportation."

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it is five minutes after 5 o'clock.

Mr. PADGETT. It is only 4 o'clock by sun time.

Mr. MADDEN. We are not running by the sun. We are running by the clock. It has been a strenuous day, and it is likely that if we undertake to finish this bill to-night it will take until 9 or 10 o'clock.

Mr. PADGETT. I think we can read it in an hour.

Mr. BRITTEN. I should like to say to my colleague from Illinois that there is nothing in this bill from now on excepting steam engineering, construction and repair, and other items that should require no time whatever except the reading.

Mr. MADDEN. Gentlemen who are members of the Naval Affairs Committee have been talking all the afternoon, wasting time, when we could have had the bill completed and passed. There is no quorum present——

Mr. WALSH. I notice that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is here.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and he has taken a part of the time this afternoon. I think we ought to have a quorum here.

Mr. PADGETT. I will agree that the committee may rise at half past five, if we may proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is, the agreement will be conditioned upon the progress we make?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, Naval Academy, exclusive of public works, $1,242,271.20.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a request for unanimous consent. It will be borne in mind that we increased the Marine Corps by 45,500 men. That necessitated the increase of appropriation here, and it is a matter of mathematical calculation as to how much the various increases must be. I have them here. I want to ask that the Clerk may read without interruption all of the provisions with reference to the Marine Corps, and that I may then offer the amendments to correct the amounts by the additions made necessary on account of this increase in the force.

Mr. BUTLER. Why does not the gentleman ask permission simply to insert them?

Mr. PADGETT. It will take only a few minutes, and I can then offer one right after the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that all provisions in the bill relating to the Marine Corps may be read without interruption, and that after the reading of that portion of the bill is concluded, the committee may recur to different paragraphs and offer amendments. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total Marine Corps, exclusive of public works, $95,673,512.64.

Mr. PADGETT. I have a number of amendments correcting these totals. I will send them all up and let the Clerk read them one by one.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Chair will direct the Clerk to report the amendments one at a time, beginning with the first one offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 67, line 7, strike out "twenty-six" and insert in lieu thereof "fifty-five." Strike out "$6,575,437" and insert "$9,891,624.50."

The amendment was agreed to.

Page 74, line 18, strike out "$95,673,512.64" and insert "$142,939,156.14."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the President to secure the more economical and expeditious delivery of materials, equipment, and munitions and secure the more expeditious construction of ships authorized and for the purchase or construction of such additional torpedo-boat destroyers, submarine chasers, and such other naval small craft, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, as the President may direct, to be expended at the direction and in the discretion of the President, $100,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question here. I did not know that we gave the President of the United States $100,000,000 in each of these war bills. I thought we gave him only $100,000,000 all told.

Mr. PADGETT. We gave him already $100,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. And is it now proposed to give him another $100,000,000? Do we give him $100,000,000 in each bill that is passed?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no. We gave him $100,000,000, and that was for construction and the building of boats and various things of that kind, which have come out of that fund, but which have not been published to the world, in respect to the numbers. This is to complete and carry on that work.

Mr. MADDEN. I thought we only gave him $100,000,000 in all.

Mr. PADGETT. We did in that first bill, but we are giving him now another $100,000,000 to finish that work.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman means that we gave him $100,000,000 in the Navy bill?

Mr. PADGETT. A year ago; yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And $100,000,000 in addition to that outside of the Navy bill?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not remember that.

Mr. MADDEN. Why, certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. This was for the Navy, the other may have been for outside purposes, for war purposes; but this is given for the construction of ships, without advertising to the world the number we were obtaining.

Mr. MADDEN. Very well.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch or other time-measuring device a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonus or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 77, line 8, after the figures "$4,000,000," strike out lines 9 to 22, inclusive.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and the chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BROWNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

All unexpended balances made for the Naval Establishment for the fiscal year 1918 in the naval appropriation act and the several acts making deficiency appropriations are hereby continued and made available for the fiscal year 1919.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I make this motion simply to call attention to the fact that when the last naval appropriation bill was passed in this House, in February, 1917, there was a great discussion over submarines and battleships, many Members expressing the opinion that we ought to build submarines only, and nothing else; that all other types of fighting ships were out of date and practically useless. I took the floor in opposition to these ideas and declared that we ought to build more aeroplanes and more destroyers. In the course of my remarks on that occasion, February 10, 1917 (Cong. Rec., 64th Cong., 2d sess., p. 3046), I said:

It seems to me that the proper balance of different classes of vessels in the Navy—battleships, destroyers, cruisers, and submarines—is something we must leave to the naval experts. I believe they are all valuable. If I were going to go on my own ideas I should be inclined to build more destroyers, believing the destroyer a much more valuable ship than any of the others in proportion to its cost. It is fast, and if we should get involved in the present unpleasantness on the other side of the ocean, or if we are going to try to protect our merchant vessels, the destroyer is the ship that we want to do it with. The submarine always runs from a destroyer. The destroyers hunt out and destroy the submarines.

That was two months before we entered the war, though we had already broken diplomatic relations with the Imperial German Government. How entirely right I was subsequent events have shown. The destroyers for which we made appropriations in that bill, which became the act of March 4, 1917, have only recently been completed. I believe that some of them were launched in April, and some are not yet completed. My recollection is that the appropriations of that act provided for the construction of 20 destroyers. Some three months or more later, when war had been declared, we provided for the construction of a hundred destroyers, and later still for a very much larger number. Most of those later authorized have not yet been started, or construction of them has but recently begun. Had we in that bill of the winter of 1917, when there was every reason to believe that we could not long avoid war, made appropriations for five or ten times as many destroyers we should be in a very much safer position to-day, and should have little further fear of submarines in transporting our troops and supplies.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, have we finished the reading?

The CHAIRMAN. But one paragraph remains. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

All appropriations contained in this act are hereby made immediately available, but no appropriation in this act shall be used for payment of deficiencies.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, before we rise, for permission to insert in the RECORD some very handsome remarks made upon our esteemed colleague in this House, Mr. GEORGE S. GRAHAM, of Philadelphia. They were delivered at a time when his picture or painting was being hung in the law association in the City Hall in Philadelphia on March 5, 1918. Can I do this in committee? It has been done heretofore, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the committee can grant to one individual leave to extend remarks but not general leave.

Mr. BUTLER. That is what I ask. Without consuming time I would like to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting this handsome tribute to a friend and to a very learned and distinguished man, a Member of this House.

Mr. WALSH. What was the occasion of this well-deserved tribute?

Mr. BUTLER. His portrait was being presented to the law library in the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. GORDON. Who made the remarks?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Hampton L. Carson, ex-Attorney General of Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, Mr. FESS, Mr. WALDOW, Mr. MUDD, Mr. MCARTHUR, Mr. PETERS, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, and Mr. OLIVER of Alabama were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: Page 10, line 23, strike out line 23 and insert the following: "grades, rank, and seniority: And provided further, That the dental officers herein and heretofore authorized for service in the Naval Reserve Force and the Naval Dental Corps shall share alike and proportionately with medical officers the several grades of rank provided for the Naval Reserve Force and the Naval Medical Corps, respectively, and the officers of the Naval Dental Corps shall earn and acquire like promotions under like mental, moral, physical, and age requirements, and be finally apportioned to like grades of rank on the same percentage basis as provided by law for the promotion and the grade apportionment of officers of the Naval Medical Corps."

Mr. WALSH. I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not think it is subject to a point of order, but we can vote it down in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is entitled to recognition.

Mr. GOOD. I understand the temper of the House, and I am not going to take any time. The amendment I have offered will do only simple justice to the dentists in the service and place them in the same rank with the Medical Corps.

Mr. BUTLER. There is a bill pending in the committee to cover this subject.

Mr. PADGETT. There is not only a bill pending in the committee, but this relates only to the Dental Corps in the reserves and the Medical Corps in the reserves. Under the existing law all ranks and grades are limited to lieutenant commander, which is equivalent to a major in the Army. Under this amendment they would have the higher ranks as well.

Mr. GORDON. In the Dental Corps?

Mr. PADGETT. In the Medical Corps and Dental Reserve Corps.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman will be fair about that. I did not propose to take any time, but the amendment I offer does not enlarge in the least the men in the Medical Corps, nor does it place any rank in the Dental Corps above the rank in the Medical Corps.

Mr. PADGETT. I know; but in the regular Medical Corps they have admirals and all the others, and this proposes to put the same rank into the Reserves as in the Medical Corps.

Mr. GOOD. The same as is done in the Army?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. GORDON. They have not done it in the Army yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out line 23, page 10, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

grade, rank, and seniority.

Mr. PADGETT. That is all right. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the effect of it?

Mr. PADGETT. They take their seniority with them in the transfer anyway. It does not affect anything.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD: On page 10, in line 23, strike out the words "rank and grade" and insert "grade, rank, and seniority."

Mr. BUTLER. I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. PADGETT. They would get that anyway.

Mr. BUTLER. I think they would, but I want to know what we are doing.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania withdraw the point of order?

Mr. PADGETT. The amendment is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. PADGETT. It is amending the language in the bill.

Mr. GOOD. This just adds "seniority."

Mr. BUTLER. They would have that anyway.

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly they would; but it is easier to pass it and go on than it is to have a dispute about it.

Mr. BUTLER. I am always a little suspicious of anything as easy as this.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, what became of the reservation of the point of order to the paragraph which I made when the gentleman offered his first amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to withdraw the point of order. Of course if a point of order is reserved, it is not in order to offer an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. The first amendment of the gentleman from Iowa was voted down, but I understood the entire paragraph was up for consideration.

Mr. MADDEN. I gave notice a little while ago that I would ask for a quorum at 5.30. I have been waiting to see whether we could complete the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. We can go ahead now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] make any point of order?

Mr. WALSH. In view of the emphatic statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] I do not dare to insist upon it. I withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to make one statement to the House. It will take only a minute, and the House will be interested to know it.

Mr. Chairman, we have increased the Navy in this bill by 78,000 men and the Marine Corps by 45,500 men. We have provided for these other enlarged activities, and at the same time the bill as it is now carries $265,481,251 less than the appropriations for the Navy for the current year.

I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill be passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. KITCHIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10854, the naval appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en bloc. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to serve notice on the House that the Committee on Naval Affairs, with the assistance of this House, passed this bill at the rate of $140,000,000 per hour, and we are going to expect future committees to do the same thing.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. KITCHIN) signed the same:

H. R. 10783. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to increase the facilities for the proof and test of ordnance material, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KING for 15 days, on account of pressing business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, April 22, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Director of the Federal Board for Vocational Education submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for rental of offices in the District of Columbia for the fiscal year 1919 (H. Doc. No. 1059); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. NONUSE OF WHEAT FLOUR IN TEXAS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I send to the desk a short letter from the Federal food administrator for the State of Texas, which I ask to have read. It announces the voluntary determination of the people of Texas to abstain from the use of wheat flour for 45 days.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
Houston, Tex., April 15, 1918.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SHEPPARD: I feel sure you will be proud of your State in connection with its voluntary offer to abstain from the use of wheat flour for a period of 45 days, effective to-day, until June 1, and longer if necessary. I telegraphed this information to Mr. Hoover Saturday afternoon, and requested him to cable same to Gen. Pershing, whom I had the honor of knowing when he was stationed in Texas. I thought this good news would be encouraging and give renewed vigor to our boys in the trenches in France.

This was not a hysterical movement, but one which the people of Texas were anxious to undertake. I did not make the request. The offers kept coming in unsolicited. Now, I feel that the Lone Star State has done a great thing and is setting a wonderful example to the balance of our Nation. Surely this ought to make Mr. Hoover's work in reference to flour conservation considerably easier.

With best wishes, I am,
Yours, sincerely,

E. A. PEDAN,
Federal Food Administrator for Texas.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I present several memorials protesting against universal military service. I simply wish to state, in connection with their presentation, that I am receiving a great many letters favoring universal military service, but as these are simply personal letters I am not filing them with the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorials will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a petition of Tacoma Lodge, No. 102, of South Tacoma, Wash., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of all Federal judges with short terms of office, and placing the power in the people to recall Federal judges, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Department of Massachusetts, Grand Army of the Republic, of Boston, Mass., praying for an increase in pensions of veterans of the Civil War, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Hudson, Mass., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented resolutions adopted by the City Council of Minneapolis, Minn., favoring the fixing of prices on cereals other than wheat, such prices to be based upon the present price of wheat, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of St. Paul, Minn., praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona presented resolutions adopted by the Arizona Division of the National Association for Universal Military Training, of Tucson, Ariz., favoring universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FERNALD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Bangor, Augusta, Belfast, and Greenville, all in the State of Maine, praying for the enactment of legislation to impose punishment on persons or organizations responsible for pro-German activities, or who in any way interfere with the successful prosecution of the war, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THIRD LIBERTY LOAN.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I send to the desk a telegram received from Herber J. Grant, chairman of the third liberty loan committee of Salt Lake, Utah, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SALT LAKE, UTAH, April 20, 1918.

Senator REED SMOOT,
Washington, D. C.:

Have to-day wired William G. McAdoo as follows: "I have the honor of advising you that Utah to-day oversubscribed allotment in third liberty loan, and makes official request for place near top on national honor flag."

HERBER J. GRANT, Chairman.

LOYALTY OF AGRICULTURAL COMMUNITIES.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I observed through the press last week that there were a number of people appearing before one of the important committees of the Senate testifying with regard to disloyalty in different parts of the United States. One reading the report of the hearings would conclude that the agricultural sections of the country were saturated with disloyalty. I do not know just how accurately these witnesses were reported, but the inference to be drawn from their statements was that entire communities—indeed, if not entire States—particularly agricultural or rural districts or communities were, as I said, saturated with disloyalty.

It seems, while these gentlemen were here advertising the disloyalty of the farmers and farmers' organizations throughout the country, the farmers at home were engaged in putting in their crops and subscribing for liberty bonds.

In order that the two sides of the question may go to the country and that the people in other parts of the world may understand that our farmers are no less loyal and no less devoted to this cause than any other class of people, I call attention to this item, which appears this morning in the Post:

All the States which have gone over the top and won honor flags are largely rural. Montana, whose quota was $9,000,000, has reported subscriptions of $14,741,000. North Dakota, with a quota of $6,500,000, has reported more than $10,000,000.

And North Dakota was particularly subjected to attack by some of these witnesses. You would suppose that the farmers, and it is almost entirely an agricultural State, were practically all out of sympathy with this Republic in its hour of peril. I regard it as a libel respecting those people.

Indications are that South Dakota has also subscribed its quota of $22,000,000. Minnesota has contributed $38,900,000, exclusive of subscriptions from Minneapolis, St. Paul, and Duluth, whose pledges amount to $37,500,000. Northern Wisconsin and northern Michigan, which report to the Minneapolis Federal reserve bank, have about $8,000,000 each.

Mr. President, a state of war not only calls out the great virtues of the people, but it calls out other characteristics less admirable. I trust that these political Pharisees who come here with the American flag wrapped around them to exploit their own virtues and to decry the virtues of entire communities and entire States will not be regarded as voicing the real sentiments of the American people in this war. I trust also that this wholesale denunciation of entire classes and communities will receive the condemnation at the hands of all sane and patriotic citizens which it deserves.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think I ought to say, if I may be permitted, in connection with and support of the observations of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], that Iowa, a purely agricultural State, a State in which the agricultural interests overshadow every other interest, was the first State in the Union to subscribe its quota to the third liberty loan. There has been some contest between Iowa and Oregon in that respect, which I shall not attempt to settle, but I think the evidence now shows rather clearly that my State was the first to complete its subscription.

I do not mention this for the purpose of promoting that Commonwealth above others, but only to indicate that the suggestions which have been made from time to time with regard to the attitude of the farmers toward the war and their unwillingness to bear their fair share of the burdens of the war are not well founded.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I do not understand that the Senator from Idaho indicated that the farmers of the Northwest, including Minnesota and other States, are disloyal, but rather dissented from that view. I have lived in that country for 53 years and my associate, I guess, many more years, and we know intimately the farming communities of the Northwest. There is absolutely no foundation for any claim that the farmers are lukewarm in the war or disloyal. Their loyalty is beyond doubt. The way they have subscribed to the last liberty bonds is a strong indication of that. I did not understand the Senator from Idaho to indicate anything to the contrary, but I may have misunderstood him.

REHABILITATION OF WOUNDED SOLDIERS.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have a letter which I would be glad to have printed in the RECORD. It relates to a bill that is pending, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The printing is objected to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a short letter from a very thoroughly informed man upon the rehabilitation of wounded soldiers and what has been accomplished along that line. I think it is valuable information for the Senate, and by simply printing it in the RECORD I felt that I could give it to the Senate and to the House also without taking the time of the Senate to read it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator can read it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can read it, but I move that it be printed.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, it is peculiarly unpleasant to me to object to the publication of the letter in the RECORD. There is no one in the Senate I would sooner please than the Senator from Georgia, but the truth is that we are absolutely short of paper in the great Printing Office. The RECORD is already burdened with an enormous expense, and nobody reads the fine print that you find in the RECORD as it is circulated in the country. A Senator may occasionally refer to it, but I think those cases are extremely rare.

I am not doing this of my own accord particularly, but it is the desire of the Committee on Printing, and I have been requested by them to stop the practice if I could possibly do it. I hope the Senate will decline to print in the RECORD matter that ought not to be printed in the RECORD. I am not referring to this particular letter, and I know my friend from Georgia will understand my position. I am acting largely under the direction of the Committee on Printing in trying to stop the practice as much as I can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia to print the communication in the RECORD.

On a division, the motion was agreed to.

The matter referred to is as follows:

INTERNATIONAL PAPER CO.,
New York, April 18, 1918.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having been identified for years in America and abroad with manufacturing interests employing many thousand men, and being familiar with labor conditions abroad and at home, I am intensely interested in your Senate bill No. 4284. It is one of the most important pieces of legislation that has been proposed. It deals with a subject of national importance which will require early attention.

At an early day our splendid young men will be returning to us, thousands of them unable to follow their own vocations and great numbers untrained in any craft.

The greatest weakness in America to-day is the lack of universal and thorough training for our young men in the various vocations. Much is being done in the agricultural colleges. The technical and industrial fields outside of agriculture almost universally fail to properly educate our young men. As a rule Americans refuse to give the time necessary for thorough training in any craft or trade.

The majority of the men in our penitentiaries are without a trade or vocation. It is this fact and the fact that they have been brought up in a vicious atmosphere that leads most of them behind the bars.

There are few large industrial concerns which have any extensive or complete system of apprenticeship.

Through your legislation or otherwise the men coming back from the front can be made efficient, can be made self-supporting, and can be put into the decimated ranks of industry, where there will always be a shortage. If you should accomplish this, the Nation would be forever indebted to you.

Now, to the point of my letter. In Europe training such as you propose is being carried on systematically and thoroughly, and they have already had the advantage of experience which has taught them what to do and, what is more important, what not to do.

If your law is put on the books and the usual red-tape methods of the departments are followed, it will be a long time before you have any reliable information on which to act. Would it not be possible for you in some way to have a very small commission—the smaller the better—sent abroad immediately to study and report on the conditions there, on the methods they pursue, etc., so that after your legislation is on the books the Government will be in position to act very promptly?

In European countries the governments are fostering combinations in the different industries and the training of men in the different industries, so that each industry may act unitedly in attacking the outside markets of the world. It is these combinations we will have to meet when the war is over. We can not act too promptly or prepare too thoroughly.

Pardon this intrusion on your time, but I am as deeply interested in this subject as you are.

Yours, very truly, P. T. DODGE.

LABOR CONDITIONS ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I send to the Secretary's desk a letter from the secretary of the Central Labor Council of the City of Seattle, with resolutions attached. I ask that the letter and resolutions be read, and I shall ask the consent of the Senate to make some remarks upon the letter and the resolutions and call attention to some rather remarkable features of the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona objects to the reading of the letter and resolutions.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I can only repeat what I have said before. As long as the present condition of print paper is as it is I shall object to printing anything in the RECORD except what is absolutely essential to the regular proceedings of the body.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, I will not insist upon the Senator withdrawing his objection, but I would like to call attention to the character of the matter that is really a statement of the subject upon which I wish to make some remarks in the Senate. It is a matter which I regard as of vital importance.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Does the Senator propose now to take the floor?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have no objection if it is preceding a speech and the speech is to be based on it. I should not like to object in such a case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn, and the Secretary will read the letter and the resolution.

The Secretary read as follows:

CENTRAL LABOR COUNCIL,
AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Seattle, Wash., April 13, 1918.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR. Please find inclosed resolutions which only in a very mild way indicate a strong undercurrent of dissatisfaction and unrest caused by what the workers have grown to look upon as unwarranted persecution of their fellow unionists in California.

At this time an appeal has gone to all local unions in this city requesting that a referendum vote be taken upon the question of declaring a strike on May 1, to continue in effect until the victimized Mooney case defendants are unconditionally freed.

Trusting that you will realize the seriousness of this acute situation and that you will be successful in precipitating action such as will make any move that will result in diminishing the productivity of the workers of the Pacific coast at this time unnecessary, I am,

Yours, very respectfully,

JAMES A. DUNCAN, Secretary.

Resolution.

Whereas a widespread suspicion exists among the workers of the Pacific coast that the bomb explosion during the preparedness parade at San Francisco and other bomb plantings in the State of California are the result of a conspiracy on the part of big business interests and some public officials in the State of California in an effort to discredit organized labor; and

Whereas the belief is general that these crimes were committed with the full intention of fastening the guilt upon working men active in labor's interests, thereby creating a false public sentiment against the organized workers, thus hindering them in their efforts to improve conditions; and

Whereas this suspicion is causing a great deal of dissatisfaction and strife at a time when there should be the utmost harmony and cooperation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Hod Carriers, Building, and Common Laborers' Union, Local No. 242, request the Government to make a thorough investigation into these various cases and prosecute the guilty parties, whoever they may be; and be it further

Resolved, That we request the Central Labor Council of Seattle and vicinity to indorse this resolution and forward copies to the President and the Washington congressional delegation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have made some investigation of the evidence that was introduced upon the trial of the State of California against Thomas Mooney. I am familiar with the ground and the landmarks in the State of California where this heinous crime was committed. I do not claim to know as much about the evidence in the case as did the jury which convicted Mooney, but I do claim to know more about it than the writer of this letter or the authors of the resolutions which the Secretary has read. There were some seven witnesses—at least seven—who testified to personal observation of Mooney at and about the time these people were murdered. If the jury believed the testimony of any three of them, in my judgment there was sufficient evidence, connected with the circumstances of the case, to convict the defendant.

As I understand the defense in that case, it did not claim that this testimony, if true, was not sufficient to sustain the verdict in the case; but the defense was based upon an attempt to impeach the credibility of the witnesses. The theory of Mooney's counsel was, or at least that which they presented to the court was, that these seven witnesses were all perjurers.

I am not going in what I have to say about this remarkable threat from a certain labor union in Seattle to go into an analysis of the evidence in the trial of Mooney. I want to call attention, however, to a circumstance of that trial which has a great deal of cogency in my mind in convincing me that the verdict in that case was a just one. I do not think that the circumstance to which I refer has ever been called attention to. It was a very slight circumstance. It might very well have passed unnoticed.

There was a woman who testified in the trial of Billings, who was first tried, who was convicted, and who was sentenced to life imprisonment, by the name of Edeau, a woman who lived in Oakland. Later on, when Mooney was put upon trial, she testified in Mooney's case. Mooney had testified in the trial of Billings, the first defendant who was tried, and was present at his trial; he was charged to be his accomplice and was the principal defendant in the group of defendants who had been apprehended and charged with this wicked murder. When the Edeau woman testified in the Mooney case that at half past 1 o'clock on the 22d day of July—which was about 36 minutes before the bomb exploded, killing 10 people, and wounding 36 others—that she saw Mooney, Mrs. Mooney, and Billings get into an automobile, driven by a man by the name of Weinberg, in front of 721 Market Street, and proceed on Market Street toward Steuart Street, seven blocks away, at the corner of which the explosion occurred 36 minutes later, she was asked why, when she previously testified in the case of Billings, in the first trial, that she saw Billings get into the automobile in front of 721 Market Street and go toward Steuart Street she had not said at that time that she saw Mooney and Mrs. Mooney get into the same automobile which Billings got into. She said the reason she had not mentioned Mrs. Mooney and Mooney was because no one had asked her if anyone else got in with him. Mooney knew whether he got into that automobile or did not; he was sitting present at the trial of Billings and testified in that trial; and I believe that the reason that Mrs. Edeau was not asked the question of who else got into the automobile with Billings was because Mooney knew that she would say, "You got into it with him," and the failure to ask that question of that witness by his counsel when that trial was on has a great deal of weight in my mind. It demonstrated the fact that Mooney did get into the automobile and did not want to have that fact disclosed in the trial of Billings, and that that was the reason that question was not asked and that the testimony of this witness—this Edeau woman—was true. Her testimony for that reason bears the marks of truth.

Mr. President, having made that preliminary remark about the testimony in the case, I want to speak about this rather remarkable production which was addressed to me and, I understand, was addressed to my colleague [Mr. JONES] and perhaps other Members of the delegation from the State of Washington, which has been read at the Secretary's desk.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Before the Senator takes up the discussion of the resolution, will he give an answer to a question with regard to the witness whose testimony has been discussed in the public prints more than any other one witness, and upon which the defense relied more apparently than upon anyone else, and they relied on that for a new trial? I ask this question because I see the Senator has studied the case, and I know that this particular point is one which has been accentuated throughout the country.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think I know what the Senator from Idaho has in mind.

Mr. BORAH. I have reference to a man who testified, and who was the main witness—so designated by the public prints—and who afterwards in a letter seemed to confess that he had testified falsely, and asked a friend of his to join with him in corroborating his testimony, and so forth, and stating to him—I can not use the exact language, but in substance—that he would be taken care of. That man was a farmer, who had formerly lived in Illinois and who wrote back to his friend in Illinois with reference to that. I confess that that letter had considerable effect upon me when I read it. I have not studied the evidence of the trial, but for a man, upon whose testimony they mainly relied for conviction, to have written a letter practically admitting that he testified falsely and asking a witness to come in and to corroborate him because he was being attacked, would have an effect upon any man who believed in the integrity of the courts. I know the Senator's capacity for judging evidence and his experience in that matter, and I should like to know if he has reviewed that branch of the case at all?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have.

Mr. BORAH. What is the Senator's opinion of that?

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is nothing in that circumstance which would change my opinion as to the guilt of the defendant upon the entire evidence that was introduced in the case. There has been a great deal of false impression—I had that myself—in regard to the conduct of this man Oxman, who is the witness to whom the Senator from Idaho refers. Oxman was a cattleman in Oregon. He was visiting in San Francisco on the day of the parade; he stopped at one of the hotels about two blocks from the ferryhouse where the parade started. He testified that he saw Mooney and his associates in and about the scene of the murder. After the trial it was disclosed—and a great sensation was made of that—that this man Oxman had written letters to an acquaintance of his by the name of Rigall in Illinois, asking Rigall to come out and corroborate his testimony, stating that he needed some corroboration, having been attacked as having testified falsely in the case. I read those letters very carefully, and I got a different impression about the matter from reading the letters themselves than that which I had received from reading certain magazine accounts of them. While the letters of Oxman to Rigall are the letters of a very ignorant man, being badly spelled, poorly expressed, and very foolish, there is nothing in them that I saw that could necessarily be construed as an effort upon Oxman's part to get Rigall to testify falsely or offering him any bribe or anything of that kind. There is no admission whatever in the letters that he himself had testified falsely and no intimation of any such admission on Oxman's part.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator if Oxman was not afterwards tried on a charge of perjury and acquitted?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The grand jury declined to indict him.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Not for the discussion of the Mooney case, which I think will be appropriately taken care of, but in the interest of historical accuracy, may I ask the Senator if he recalls that after Oxman had written to Indiana to a man whom he knew was not present, asking that individual to come to California and testify he was present, and after the man whom Oxman knew was not there had come in pursuance of Oxman's letter, Oxman took that particular individual, Rigall, to the authorities in San Francisco and said substantially: "This is the man who was with me at the particular time and saw just exactly what I did." Does the Senator recall that as part of the testimony?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I am not aware that there was testimony of that kind. I was speaking of the letters that Oxman had written to Rigall.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. In pursuance of which——

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will allow me just at this point to complete what I was about to say, then I will yield to him. There is nothing, so far as one can see from the letters, to indicate whether Rigall was in California or not at the time of the tragedy. Oxman testified that he added a postscript to the letter upon a separate sheet, in which he stated that if Rigall did not see him there, of course he would not be expected to testify; but what he held out as the inducement was not a bribe, or anything of that kind, but simply a rather glowing account of the fine trip he would have and the amount of mileage to which he would be entitled as a witness.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not defending the witness Oxman at all.

Mr. BORAH. I was going to say that I take it the Senator relies upon the testimony as being sufficient outside of the Oxman testimony.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. BORAH I certainly do not think anybody would want to convict a man upon Oxman's testimony after that statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would not, I will say, if the case depended solely upon Oxman's testimony; but the Senator will recognize that bad witnesses often tell the truth. Whether or not Oxman saw these people at the time he said he did, I do not know, but whether he did or not, my opinion as to the guilt of Mooney is not changed.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, just one further circumstance. As I have indicated, this is a case which I have declined to discuss here and shall decline to discuss in the future, because of obvious reasons—obvious to me at least—but I wanted to call to the Senator's attention the further fact that Weinberg, the driver of the jitney bus, subsequently was tried, and Oxman after his letters were developed did not testify at the trial of Weinberg.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am aware of that.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. And Weinberg was acquitted. I am not speaking merely of Oxman's testimony——

Mr. POINDEXTER. If I may ask, inasmuch as the Senator has interrupted me on the subject, what is the opinion of the Senator from California as to the guilt or innocence of Thomas Mooney?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I have no opinion. The difficulty with the case, since the Senator asks me, I will state to him is this: The defendant is an unworthy man, capable of the crime; a man who has indulged in the past in practices in which he should not have indulged.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Who?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mooney.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What practices?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I think that he was engaged in transporting on various occasions dynamite, and, in my opinion, he was capable of this offense. My opinion of Mooney is a prejudiced opinion; but, in my opinion, too, the testimony that contributed most to his conviction was the testimony of Oxman; and Oxman was not ascertained to be what he was until after the trial of Mooney. Mooney perhaps would not have been convicted but for Oxman's testimony. There you have the situation from my standpoint.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, Mr. President, that is an opinion, and there might be an infinite variety of opinions from different people even among jurors. Oxman was one out of some seven witnesses who testified as to the presence of Mooney and the conduct of Mooney in connection with the explosion.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, yes; but he was the witness who testified with greatest particularity, and his testimony, according to many of those who were present at the trial, was the convincing testimony in the Mooney case.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator takes up the discussion I should like to ask him a question. I will first state that I have had a number of communications on this subject from various labor unions, some in my State and some elsewhere. Some suggest the calling of a general sympathetic labor strike on May day throughout the United States, one of which, I think, is now called in the State of Rhode Island. Most of them recite their conviction of the innocence of the defendant. The Board of Mediation, of which John H. Walker, president of the Illinois Federation, is a member, by the President, was dispatched some time ago to the Pacific coast to investigate labor conditions. The commission not only investigated labor difficulties but undertook to pass upon Mr. Mooney's case, and did so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have some quotations from their report, to which I will call attention later.

Mr. SHERMAN. They recommended to the President that he communicate with Gov. Stephens, of California; and the President, as I remember, did so, asking executive clemency. I was going to ask the Senator if he intends to take up that matter?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am glad of that, because I am interested in the matter, as it relates to my own section of the country, as well as to California.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad the Senator has made that statement, because it corroborates my opinion as to the importance of the question and the widespread movement which has grown out of it. It is a matter of paramount importance, in my judgment.

The letter and resolutions which have just been read by the Secretary of the Senate exemplify and illustrate a movement of certain lawless elements in the United States and in other countries, particularly in Russia, which if not arrested will plunge the world into anarchy and bloodshed. This letter and these resolutions, coming from the Central Labor Council of the important industrial city of Seattle, Wash., and from certain local labor unions affiliated with that council, are nothing more or less than an attempt at blackmail of the Government, both State and National. It is a threat on the part of these false representatives of labor to take advantage of the desperate emergency of war in which this country is now involved, by shutting off production of needed equipment and supplies from our soldiers in the field, to coerce the authorities of the law into setting free Thomas Mooney and an accomplice, who have been convicted by due process of law, upon the unanimous verdict of a jury of 12 men, of the crime of murder.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield just a little later, if the Senator please. I would rather make this connected statement, and then I shall be glad to yield to any question that the Senator cares to ask.

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply wanted to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that this was a prosecution entirely under State law, not in a United States court, no Federal question at all being involved, but entirely a matter of State jurisdiction?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is one of the main points to which I want to call attention.

The murders of which these men were convicted were out of the ordinary. The patriotic citizens of San Francisco, responding to the noblest emotion which civilized man has developed—patriotic love of country and of their fellowman—were marching in a so-called preparedness parade on the 22d day of July, 1916. Men, women, and children were taking this means of expressing their sympathy with the work of preparing their country to protect the rights, liberties, and lives of its citizens. They had committed no offense against the perpetrators of this crime.

Innocent and unsuspecting, they were engaged in a demonstration of loyalty to their country. While they were walking peacefully on the street in this parade a fiend, uniting the malice of the devil with the intelligence of the human mind which was given to him for a better purpose, exploded among these peaceful and innocent citizens a bomb which destroyed the lives of 10 people and wounded 36 others.

Thomas Mooney, the man mentioned in the letter and the resolutions which have been read, was put upon trial for this offense. He was defended by the ablest counsel that influence and money could procure. Every protection which our most liberal and considerate judicial system casts around the person of a prisoner was given him. A judge, sworn to enforce the law and subject to the review of a higher court, ruled upon the evidence that was introduced and kept it within those humane lines which the Anglo-Saxon people have devised for the ascertainment of the truth and the protection of the rights and liberties of the individual. A jury of 12 men of the vicinity, ascertained under oath to be without prejudice or preconceived opinion or interest in the case, were sworn to render a true verdict. The defendant, through his counsel, introduced his evidence, cross-examined the witnesses of the State, had a full hearing upon every clue, phase, and argument which the ingenuity of brilliant lawyers employed in his defense could devise. The jury of 12 returned a unanimous verdict that the defendant, Thomas Mooney, was guilty of the cowardly and infamous crime.

The writer of the letter which has just been read and those who are responsible for the passage of the resolutions attached did not hear this evidence nor the arguments in the case and, of necessity, under the circumstances in which they are situated, can not possibly be in a position to render judgment upon it. The jury and the court which tried the case concentrated their attention upon every minutia and detail to which their own minds or those of the lawyers engaged could direct their consideration. Mr. Duncan and the so-called labor leaders who induced the membership of the organizations named to pass these resolutions can not possibly know as much about the case as the jury which heard the evidence. Furthermore, they are partisans of the defendant, and for that reason not in a position to render an unbiased judgment. The resolutions on the face of them do not purport to recite facts. On the contrary, they are based expressly, by their own terms, merely upon "suspicion" and "general belief." Upon this suspicion and general belief, so stated, certain leaders of these organizations have induced their membership, or a certain portion of the same, to make the astounding charge that these murders in the State of California were committed as "the result of a conspiracy on the part of big business interests and some public officials in the State of California in an effort to discredit organized labor." As stated above, it is not claimed in putting out this scandalous, blasphemous, and wicked charge that it is based upon any information or facts, but is stated, on the contrary, to be suspicion and general belief. Such a charge in itself is a crime against decency and all proprieties of organized society. The suggestion is unreasonable and preposterous on the face of it, suggesting a repulsive crime committed without sane motive or rational purpose.

There is no doubt that in California particularly, as well as in other States in times past, so-called "big business interests" have committed crimes of violence as well as of corruption; but always with an understandable motive, and under circumstances capable of proof. If such a suggestion as that which is boldly promulgated in this resolution were founded upon facts, a small part of the energy and resources which have been expended by the advocates of dynamite and "direct action" in the defense of Thomas Mooney would have discovered the proofs and presented them to the court. The absence of any intimation even that such proof exists shows conclusively that none does exist.

When these interests referred to were guilty of such crimes they were likewise subjected to due process of law through the courage and ability of public-spirited lawyers, such as the distinguished gentleman [Mr. JOHNSON], now junior Senator from that great State, and the fearless lawyer, Francis J. Heney. Some of the defendants were subjected to the penalties of the law. Some of them may have escaped the hands of justice, just as many others in our times have so escaped.

The business of government is to wield the sword of justice with impartiality against the offenders of the law and the enemies of society, whether they come from the ranks of big business or from corrupt and vicious so-called leaders of labor.

What is it that labor, whether it was the serf bound to the soil in the Dark Ages or the struggling mass of mankind of an industrial day, groped and struggled for but the protection of law against the hand of the tyrant? What other refuge can the oppressed have? The only other recourse is to the discretion, the humanity, the charity of a ruler; and, sad to say, the tragedies of mankind are proof that this dependence, when subjected to the temptations of self-interest, of ambition, or of hatred, is utterly in vain. The shield and protection of the weak, the poor, the man who labors with his hands, the employee of every kind, against the oppressor, the employer, the rich, the powerful, the ambitious, the wicked, is the law. The attack which the writer of the letter and the author of the resolutions introduced just now are making upon the law and upon the courts is an attack upon their own temple of safety. If the authority of the courts should be destroyed, if their carefully determined decrees are arbitrarily and without investigation, merely upon "suspicion" and "general belief," set aside; if recourse is to be had to such blackmail as that that is proposed in this communication or to terrorism, to sabotage, to dynamite and murder, to the doctrines of "direct action" of the bolsheviki and the I. W. W., the weak are the ones who will suffer in any such decision.

I venture to say that with all of the imperfections of human nature, from which we can not escape under any system that the wit of man ever devised, and with all of the mistakes which the mind of man, however well intentioned, may sometimes make, there is not a State nor a city between the two oceans in this great Republic where an honest laborer seeking protection or justice can not find a judge somewhere who will zealously guard his rights, his liberties, his property, his life, with the ægis of the law against the hand of the despoiler.

Take this away, and, more than all the rest, the weak will suffer; the strong and the powerful can find means of protecting themselves; those who are vicious among them—and there are always such—will gratify their desires upon the helplessness of those who are weaker than they. Tear down the courts and the law, and there is left the spectacle of a bloody tyranny; of ignorance, avarice, and cruelty imposing its brute will upon all who differ with it or stand in its way. We see that spectacle in Russia to-day, and those who are rioting there in the gratification of their lawless desire for power are the counterparts and coworkers against law and established government of the authors of these resolutions and of the propaganda of murder, assassination, revolution, direct action, sabotage, and anarchy which is stalking through the land. The greatest issue that confronts not only the American people, but the western world, is the suppression of this arrogant, insolent, and tyrannical movement. Its leaders need to be subjected to the power of the Government.

The threat contained in these letters, to gratify their defiance of the law at the expense of our youth who are fighting for the liberty which these men enjoy, needs to be put down by the strong hand of the Government.

No one but a coward would commit such a crime as Mooney was convicted of. Those who are putting forward this propaganda are cowards in their hearts. They attempt to gain their purpose by blackmail and stealthy secret attack. They are afraid to submit their cause to reason and the just judgment of their fellow men. They attempt by innuendo and concealment to avoid the law. They need to be dragged out of their cover and subjected to the light of public scrutiny and of judicial inquiry and to that punishment which blackmail and murder deserve.

These men do not represent labor. There is no element of our population which has more of human sympathy, more sense of justice, more love of country than the rank and file of labor and many of its true leaders. There is a vicious element in their ranks, largely composed of aliens, who are not only disloyal and seditious but enemies of the country and enemies of mankind. They preach so-called "internationalism," which is getting to be a very familiar word. They claim no country; they have and desire no fixed dwelling place; the institution of home, which is at the foundation of our social structure, has no sacredness to them; they blaspheme God and religion and set their ignorant and insolent judgment against the teachings of civilization. There are a few so-called labor leaders who take advantage of this element to advocate what they call "direct action," which means accomplishment of their ends by lawless violence. They propose to use violence upon others, and yet they cry out to heaven at any invasion of their so-called constitutional rights. They seem to have a one-sided and one-eyed philosophy. They propose sabotage and direct action against others, but claim that others have no right to use sabotage and direct action or force against them. They do not condemn, by whomsoever it was committed, the heinous crime by which the innocent citizens of San Francisco, marching in a preparedness parade, were hurled into eternity without the slightest cause, and yet even when a known advocate of such methods, like Thomas Mooney, has been given a trial in court—represented by counsel, cross-examined the witnesses for the State, given the right to testify himself, presented his own evidence—they object to his conviction and punishment. This philosophy is the same as that which lies back of the doctrine of force from whatever source it comes. The bolsheviki of Russia, the I. W. W., or direct-action Socialists of the United States are the brothers of the militarism of Prussia. All advocate and justify the doctrine that might is right, but all attach this condition—that the might must be exercised by themselves. They all object to the application of force by anyone else against them. The German tyrant contends that the submarine boat shall sink passenger ships and drown innocent women and children without notice, but objects to complying with the law of war because, as he expressly states, the submarine boats are thin and might be destroyed if they complied with the law. He believes that it is correct and proper to send a trunkful of bombs to Sweden but violently protests against the violation of diplomatic etiquette and ethics by the Swedish Government in seizing this trunkful of bombs.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if he noticed, when the late industrial commission was conducting an investigation in the city of New York, that a Mr. St. John—a member, I think, of the I. W. W. cult—gave direct testimony to this effect: That sabotage is right, because the end justifies the means; that violence is right, because the end justifies the means; that murder is right, because the end justifies the means. Yet that man, after that testimony—the Senator will find it in the record—was allowed to march out from the room where the hearing was held, and join his compatriots in continuing the kind of thing that the Senator is so ably and properly presenting to the Senate to-day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thank the Senator for calling attention to that evidence, and the fact that this man was allowed to walk out and is still walking about and carrying on his propaganda is the reason why I feel justified in making these remarks this morning and calling attention to this movement of certain so-called false representatives of labor. I did not see the testimony which the Senator from New Hampshire refers to, but it corroborates, and I suppose that was the reason why the Senator interjected it at that point, the comparison which I was making between the philosophy of the I. W. W. and that of the Kaiser as to the doctrine of the end justifying the means, force being right whenever it is necessary to accomplish their ends. There is no difference whatever between them.

Now, the Prussian Government plots with Mexico, or its representative in Argentina, to seize and partition the territory of the United States, or to sink ships without notice, but vehemently protests against the impropriety of the United States in exposing its correspondence on these subjects. The I. W. W. and their principal conspirators among the small percentage of so-called labor leaders, who misrepresent labor, advocate such murders as that of which Mooney was convicted. They have committed or procured the commitment of many such murders, yet when, as a natural consequence of these acts, an outraged citizenry hang a few of them, they protest violently against the lawlessness of the acts. That is the worst consequence of their doctrines—namely, that it leads to lawlessness—though they themselves will be the victims of it. The prime essential for any state of human existence which those who are bred to American principles can conceive of, under whatever form of government may be evolved in the experience of mankind, is order and law—the government of lives and property by a settled rule, and not by the whims, caprices, and desires of individuals. The war which these men are making against the law is a war against organized society. The consequences of it, if it is not suppressed, will be general disorder, social anarchy, poverty, and distress, hunger, and cold, ignorance and vice—a return, in short, to a condition of primeval bestiality. Out of this, if every spark of human learning and virtue shall not be extinguished in the ordeal, will ultimately come the arbitrary and tyrannical rule by the will of strong men, subject to no law. In it all there will be no such thing as even the opportunity for decent labor, at decent wages, under decent conditions; no possibility of a home, however small it may be, with its unspeakable joys. In it all there will be no possibility of enjoying the fruits of one's labors, whether it be of the artist, of the plowman, of the mechanic, of the scientist, of the discoverer, of the inventor, of the soldier, of the patriot, of the statesman, or of the author, who have all contributed to the sum total of human civilization and of what we call the wealth of the world. This is contrary to the doctrines of these people I am talking about. They claim that the accumulated wealth of the world was the result of common laborers' work; still, as everyone knows, all the vocations which I have just mentioned have contributed to what we have and what we are to-day.

If the law and the courts are to be overthrown, there will be no security in the enjoyment of the fruits of labor, nothing but slavery and woe. That is the inevitable outcome ultimately of persistence in the doctrines of force that are promulgated by the authors of these papers which the Secretary has just read. They ought to be put down, in the interest of labor, whether organized or unorganized, so that a man shall be free from their tyranny and oppression; that a laboring man may join a union if he sees fit or stay out if he sees fit, exercising his own reason and intelligence in the matter; that he shall not be coerced by a lot of soft-handed, misnamed labor leaders into giving up his position or the wages of his toil at their dictation. Labor is to be protected in the right to organize, if it sees fit, with the same obedience and compliance with the laws of the land that is required of every citizen great and small. These men are to be subjected to the law. The writers of this threat to hold up the Government, to cut off supplies from those deathless heroes who stand between us and the German horror, should be visited not only with the just indignation of an outraged public but with the punishment prescribed for blackmail, disloyalty, sedition, and treason. Any such act as that threatened in these communications should be punishable by the most severe penalties. It combines in itself elements of not only blackmail and coercion of government but of threats against all organized authority and the courts, and indicates an utter lack of human brotherhood and a cruelty beyond conception. It is in itself a conspiracy to foment sedition and insurrection both by peaceful and violent methods, express or implied. It would be giving aid and comfort to the enemy, and hence would be moral treason. The act itself would be an unspeakable crime. It is aggravated by the motives which are here insolently set forth for it, the act itself being worse than murder, deserving the extreme penalty of death, if it should result in the death of our soldiers. The threat to commit it contained in these papers is a crime against the State and the Government and should be punished.

These men should be arrested and dealt with as disloyal traitors to the land which has given them more than they could have obtained from any other Government in the world. They are false to the land which has befriended them and given them their opportunities. They have perverted liberty into license, and should be regarded as what they proclaim themselves to be in this letter and these resolutions, namely, the enemies of organized society. I say that because it is expressly proposed here, by attacking the productive power of the Government to equip and feed its soldiers and the judicial decree of California, to not only oppose but defeat the processes of the law and the vital purposes of the State and Federal Governments. That makes the authors of this proposal enemies of the people, and it is my purpose to so designate and proclaim them. I repudiate their claim that they represent labor, whether organized or unorganized. They do not know what labor is.

Their hands are soft in the luxury which they secure by preying upon their dupes. This country is a country of labor. It is a new land, without caste or privilege, where labor stands upon an equal footing and enjoys equal rights with every other element of society. In our short history we have reclaimed a continental wilderness by labor. We honor labor. However poor a man may be in this country, however hard he may work, if he joins us as a brother in such support as he is able within his power to give to our Commonwealth in this experiment which we have launched amid the tribulations of the world, he will receive the warm hand of friendship and respect of every man worthy of the blessings of freedom. There can be no greater sacrilege or blasphemy than for red-handed criminals to be fattening themselves on the fruits of honest labor and carrying on their propaganda in its name. The sooner the lines are drawn against such threats as that contained in these papers which have been read and in countless circulars, books, and documents which have been circulated by this element, the sooner the country realizes that lawlessness and revolution are threatening our institutions, the more apt we will be to escape their awful curse.

It is my purpose to-day, in this place where one speaks with a sense of responsibility and where words uttered are heard by the great American people, to proclaim my belief that the greatest responsibility which rests upon the Government to-day, both that of this Federal Union and of the several States in fulfilling their sovereign responsibilities, as a vital and component part of the issues of the war which we are waging against the doctrine of lawlessness and blood abroad, is to put down with the strong hand of lawful authority the doctrine of unbridled force and lawlessness at home.

In the report of the labor commission appointed by the President to investigate labor conditions in the West, including a report upon the Mooney case made on January 16, 1918, there are some remarkable side lights upon the connection of Mooney and his prosecution with the revolutionary agitation now demanding the attention of the world. In the eleventh and twelfth paragraphs of the report it is stated:

It is well known that the attention of the situation—

This is quoting from the report—

It is well known that the attention of the situation in the East—

Meaning in the eastern part of the United States. I have interpolated that in order to explain it—was first aroused through meetings of protest against the Mooney conviction in Russia.

I should like the Senate to note that. Continuing the quotation from the report:

From Russia and the Western States protests spread to the entire country, until it has gathered momentum from many sources. * * * However strange or however unexpected it may be—the just disposition of the Mooney case thus affects influences far beyond the confines of California.

Says this report—

I might transpose that and say the attempt is made to direct the disposition of the Mooney case by influences far beyond the confines of California. It is not so much a question of the Mooney case having its influence beyond the confines of California as it is a question of a band of anarchists in Petrograd undertaking to hold up the Government of the United States.

The world now knows the true character of the Russian Maximalism. We know now from actual test and demonstration all of the sincerity there is in their claim as to liberty of opinion, in view of their massacre or suppression of all who dare to differ with them. We now see from the ruin of that great country, upon which they have gotten their clutches, the true extent of their genius for government and the practical good sense of their ideas for conducting the affairs of men. They have given a living demonstration, or rather a dying one, with the unfortunate Russian people as the subject of their experiment, of their conception of justice. Seizure and confiscation of property, murder of officers, denial of God and religion, and the substitution for the fundamental principles of morality—learned and adopted through centuries of experience, even before Moses formulated them for the children of Israel in the wilderness—the emanations of the wonderful brain of Trotsky, alias Braunstein.

And so it is from the anarchists and bolsheviki of Russia that this movement has originated, culminating in an organized threat at Seattle, Wash., to tie up the war industries of the United States on the 1st day of May, 1918. And so it is from Petrograd, with its profound knowledge of the principles of American justice and of Anglo-Saxon law and liberty, and with its intimate familiarity with the proof and the proceedings in the trial of Thomas Mooney at San Francisco, that has originated the demand, accompanied by a threat, that the decrees of the courts of the sovereign State of California must be unconditionally set aside under the pains and penalty of bolsheviki terrorism.

It is well to note, Mr. President, that this labor commission, reporting officially upon the Mooney case, officially state that it did not undertake to pass upon the guilt or innocence of this man. In the eighth paragraph they use this language in addressing the President [quoting]:

But it was not deemed the province of your commission to establish the guilt or innocence of Mooney and his associates. We conceived it to be our duty merely to determine whether a solid basis exists for a feeling that an injustice has been done.

Mr. President, of course the most important question involved in this whole matter is the security of the judgments of the law and the authority of the courts.

Everyone who is familiar with criminal proceedings in American courts knows the difficulties under which the State labors in enforcing justice against a criminal defendant. The cooperation of everyone of a host of officials is essential to the success of the prosecution, however guilty the defendant may be. Weakness or corruption on the part of a grand juror, a prosecuting attorney, the judge, any one of the trial jury, or even on the part of a clerk or a bailiff of the court may, and in some cases inevitably will, result in the acquittal of a guilty person; whereas, on the other hand, the defendant is surrounded by an almost fantastic series of defenses developed through the extreme jealousy of the Anglo-Saxon people for the rights and liberty of the individual. It is necessary for the State to secure the interest and efficient cooperation of every one of a host of officials, while the complicity or corruption of any one of them will result in the freeing of the defendant. That Mooney had the benefit of all of this is recognized by the official commission referred to in the following statement in the eighth paragraph of their report:

The convictions—

Quoting from the report—of Billings and Mooney followed trials in accordance with the established course of American procedure. It is familiar to students of jurisprudence that no system of criminal administration in the world hedges such safeguards around a case as does an American trial. The conviction, in other words, was based on evidence narrowly confined to the specific issues. Furthermore, proof of guilt had to be established beyond a reasonable doubt and established to the unanimous satisfaction of a jury of 12 persons selected from among the people. Conviction by an American jury is guilt determined by a very democratic institution. There is no question but that the jury acted in good faith upon the evidence as it was submitted.

That is the end of the quotation from the official report.

Nevertheless the commission proceeds to say that on account of subsequent developments, and notwithstanding the fact that it has not undertaken to investigate the question of whether or not Mooney was actually guilty, the President of the United States should step outside of the functions of his Federal office and use the enormous power and influence of his position to interfere with the judicial decrees of the State of California.

It is well to bear in mind the character of this defendant, as officially reported by this labor commission. To say the least, the membership of this commission, in view of their report and their association with labor organizations, could not have been charged with a hostile bias against Mooney. This is what they say of him in paragraph 4 of their report:

Mooney at the time of his arrest was a well-known labor radical on the Pacific coast. He associated with anarchists. He was a believer in "direct action" in labor controversies. He had once been indicted for attempted dynamiting of property of a San Francisco utility, but after three trials was acquitted.

As to Billings, an accomplice of Mooney, who was convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment, this same report states as follows:

Billings, a youth touched by radical propaganda, was one of Mooney's friends. He, too, was a believer in "direct action." He had been previously convicted of carrying explosives on a passenger car.

What is the meaning of these statements? It is simply that these men were propagandists of murder and destruction of property by dynamite; that they taught and believed in as a principle of their lives just such murders as that with which they were charged and of which the jury convicted them. It seems that these men were a part of that organized army typified by the bolsheviki, the anarchists, the Industrial Workers of the World, and direct-action socialists, who at this moment are attacking by every means at their command the very foundations of the American Republic. And it is in the face of this menace which is stalking through the land and in behalf of self-confessed advocates of murder and rapine that this movement, originating with the anarchists of Petrograd and taken up in Seattle by the authors of the letter and the resolutions which have been read, is seeking, by the threat of curting off supplies from our soldiers engaged in a desperate battle for the liberties of mankind, to coerce the Government of the United States to invade the sovereign rights of the State of California and set these convicted murderers "unconditionally free."

This insolent threat to tie up the war industries of the United States is an outgrowth of a conspiracy which has its agents in every country and whose object is the terrorism of the world. It is time for the people of the United States to be advised. Liberty and civilization are at stake. While this propaganda is in partnership with the Prussian military autocracy, it goes further and is more deep-rooted even than that. It is a peculiar circumstance that a certain type of pacifists, who claim they are opposed to all war and for peace at any price, preach the doctrine and practice of the dynamiting of innocent people as a protest against preparedness of the United States to protect itself against foreign aggression. Others of the same type sell themselves for money to the most ruthless military tyrants and slave drivers in history, to preach peace at any price to the peasants of Russia. So works the devil in Petrograd and in San Francisco. In one form or another the same partnership between the war party of Berlin and the peace party of Lenine is at work to-day in every country in the world. Ruthless military power for Germany and helpless disarmament, anarchy, and disorder for the rest of the world is their plan.

The German militarists hired the syndicalists and bolsheviki of the United States, just as they did those of Russia. In the Literary Digest of April 20, 1918, on page 23, will be found the details of the intimate partnership and employment of the anarchists and bolsheviki of Spain by the German Embassy to carry on a secret war against the Government of that friendly neutral country whose hospitality and protection the embassy was at that time enjoying. Such is the false and traitorous heart of these people.

As showing the partnership existing between the Prussian advocates of lawless force and the dynamiters of the Mooney and the Industrial Workers of the World type, notice the detailed account of their joint labors in Russia and Spain, and bear in mind that a large part of the bolsheviki and Maximalist agitators and criminals that delivered Russia, bound in slave chains to Germany, and who are now working for Germany and putting into effect in that country their syndicalist doctrines, went there from the United States, and many of them from San Francisco—and I will produce evidence to that effect whenever it is called for—and that a part of their equipment consisted of a large quantity of copies of a pacifist speech delivered in the United States Senate. Through these anarchists, syndicalists, pacifists, dynamiters, and murderers the German Embassy in Spain, wearing the mask of friendship, made secret war on the country to which it had been accredited. Von Bernstorff carried on the same Machiavellian tactics here, flourished under our protection, and stabbed us in the back. He hired men to commit arson—and there has been a great deal of proof of that published in the last day or two, in addition to what was already well known—murder, and rapine, and sardonically laughed at our innocent and rather stupid toleration. I have that from personal associates of his.

Men of the Mooney type were his tools and agents. Von Bernstorff should have been arrested here and put on trial for his crimes as any common criminal or enemy spy. When he openly advertised in advance that the Lusitania would be sunk without notice or opportunity for its passengers to escape he should have been held responsible as an accomplice in the murder of the women and children on board. Von Bernstorff has gone, let us hope, never to return, but his fellow spies are still plotting murder and sabotage in the United States. Every center of pacificism and bolshevikism is fertile soil for their propaganda. The draft riots in Quebec were the result of their work and that of their Industrial Workers of the World and other dupes taking advantage of a situation preexisting.

If the author of this threat of a blackmail strike on May 1 and those like him are not satisfied with the principles of American justice, with the high wages that any man who works can receive in America, with the security which this country gives him in his freedom of lawful action, and in the possession of the wages of his labor, then they should look around the world and find a better place to live in. One of the blessings of American institutions is that these men are free to leave the United States if they do not like it. If they are so enamored of German autocracy as to work in its interest, they perhaps could find happiness by taking up their abode in that country, or possibly they would find more enjoyment in life in Turkey, or in Austria, or in Armenia—by contrast with the hardships which they have to endure in the United States. Especially in Russia it would seem that they could find happiness, as those who are in control advocate the same principles as theirs—of a government composed exclusively of "working men" and an army composed entirely of private soldiers.

In opening the argument for the defense in the trial in San Francisco on Friday last of Hindus and Germans charged with a conspiracy to overthrow British rule in India, Theodore J. Roche said to the jury that Capt. Fritz von Papen, military attaché of the German embassy in Washington, was the conceiving mind of this conspiracy, which, he stated, was world wide and world important. Quite a significant statement, coming from the attorney for the defense!

The attempted revolution and massacre in India; the riots and mob killings in Quebec; the tie-up of copper production in Butte; the sabotage in the wheat fields of Dakota and Washington—and I will pause at this point to say that after going to the labor and the expense of cultivating the ground and seeding the wheat, the farmers of eastern Washington last year had to organize themselves, to employ secret agents, and establish a system of rapid communication in order to protect the fruits of their labor from being burned up by Industrial Workers of the World; the "mysterious influence" which has blighted our aeroplane production; the anarchist attack upon Prime Minister Count Romanones in Spain; the colossal treason of Russia, in which—and this is one of the most remarkable things in history—a German agent, a spy, became prime minister of the country, disbanded the army, and surrendered a hundred million souls to a foreign tyrant; the burning and blowing up of factories in New Jersey and Pennsylvania; the anticonscription insurrection in Oklahoma; the murder in San Francisco of marchers in the preparedness parade; the propaganda of American bolsheviki in Petrograd to defy the judgment of the court by which the perpetrators of that crime were convicted; and the threat from Seattle to call a general strike on May 1 unless these convicts were "unconditionally freed," are all a part of one connected movement to overturn the foundations of society and set up a hobo government in its place. First, destruction; then loot and rapine; then military autocracy are the incentives and the objects of this insane program.

The intellectual vagaries of benign but irrational visionaries, the abysmal ignorance of masses of its innocent human tools, and the murderous instincts of the avowed criminal enemies of social order are the material with which it works. Many of its parts are not conscious of their connection with each other, but it all moves as a cohesive and coordinate whole from a lever which is worked by the master criminals of mankind. Their proposed prey is the human and material accumulated wealth of the world. It is an astounding occurrence, and to us, awakened from our long dream of peace, seems difficult of conception. These conspirators against the peace and happiness of mankind have taken the gifts of God—the intelligence that has come with civilization, the inventions of science, the products of modern art—and, turning them into instruments of destruction, have made war on their own Creator. Those good gifts, which were put into the hands of these men for good, have been perverted to evil purposes. It is as though they had eaten of the forbidden fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and that they will hear "the voice of God walking in the garden in the cool of the day" and saying unto this Adam, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; in toil shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life." It is as though again the man be "driven out" and again be "placed at the east of the Garden of Eden cherubim, and the flame of a sword" which shall turn "every way to keep the way of the tree of life."

But strange as it may seem to us that such a madness should seize the world, it is not new. Many times before have tyrants and criminals conspired to subject the world to their lust. And many times have they succeeded. Civilization as we know it is but a recent acquirement and rests upon no immovable foundations. After all, its roots go no deeper than human nature itself. And it is with the foibles and follies, the mutations and vices, of men's characters that this war for its preservation must be waged. H. Rider Haggard says that an ancient civilization once flourished in the heart of Africa and left vast monuments as proof of its power and science, but that it has disappeared so completely that no man knows whence it came or whither it went; and he remarks that our civilization, so far from being permanent, hangs upon such delicate balances that their dislocation might easily destroy it and utterly blot it from the face of the earth.

I will not tax the patience of the Senate to pursue that thought, but influences that are at work to-day easily demonstrate its truth. Careful and responsible statesmen have recently pointed out that a world famine is by no means a remote possibility. Some of the fairest regions which in 1914 smiled in the comfort and beauty of art and plenty are to-day but the abode of desolation. The most beautiful monuments of religion and art are but crumbling ruins. The fields are but barren craters of chalk and clay, and their forests but shattered stumps, their people gone, victims of starvation, lust, mutilation, and slaughter. Whole races of men—as in Armenia, Poland, Serbia—have been literally wiped from the face of the earth.

Machinery, scientific instruments, libraries, architectural examples, every appliance and muniment of learning have been consumed in the tempest of hate. Already in large areas has supervened that aftermath of regular and organized warfare—an unorganized and ruthless anarchy, as in Russia, where roving bands of human brutes are exhausting themselves in the destruction of everything that stands for modern civilization and enlightenment. Means of transportation have been paralyzed, the material with which it can be replaced has disappeared, and the inevitable result of general hunger and poverty, of the removal of all security of property and life, is a quick relapse into a primitive mode of life.

The light of the world is not a continuous or permanent one. It has gained brilliancy at various times and places, as in ancient Egypt or Assyria, and then gone out as completely as though it had never been. These same Vandals who are attempting once again to destroy the world ravaged Gaul and pillaged Rome. They extinguished a more brilliant intellectual civilization than our own, and plunged the world into utter darkness, from whose Dark Ages the light of the Renaissance did not emerge for 1,000 years.

They extinguished the light of the world, and their very name became a byword for ruthless and senseless destruction even unto this day. Their present Emperor, speaking to his troops at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1896, adjured his soldiers to imitate the example of Attila and his Huns, and if his brutal hand is not stayed by the allied forces, if the devastation he has wrought should be continued, if his partnership with the dark forces of treason, anarchy, dynamite, and revolution should prevail it may well be that the light of the world, the light of liberty and of learning, will be again extinguished, and our race be even now in the penumbra of another approaching darker age of misery and ignorance. There is only one thing with which this threat can be averted and that is force. Some have believed that the armed forces of evil could be met and combated by an appeal to their better natures. They have no better natures. Some pacifists have deceived themselves into believing that by disarming and arguing with the enemy for peace we could better preserve our ideals. It would be just as effective to repeat the Beatitudes to a Bengal tiger crouched to spring—better, in fact, because a Bengal tiger might be so surprised at such a proceeding as to be frightened away. I heard a great orator among our pacifists, in arguing against preparedness, say that "we should take the money which war costs and build macadam roads, and that if the Kaiser made war on us we should say to him we had no time for war, that we had priceless ideals to preserve for the benefit of mankind." As a matter of fact, that is what France, England, and America, in substance, did say to him, with the consequences that we have seen.

Such is the issue of mankind to-day, and such are the stakes. There is a homely old saying of "fighting the devil with fire." If Mooney advocates force, give him force. If the writer of this letter, threatening a blackmail strike against our soldiers, wants coercion, give him coercion. Only let it be lawful force administered by established authority. They and all their kind from the Kaiser down understand and respect that argument. They neither understand nor respect any other.

Liberty is at stake, and the capacity of a free Republic to save itself from being destroyed by its own freedom is on trial. More than that is at stake, and more than that is on trial. It is whether this people, the coheirs of civilization, which we have received in common with our British, French, Italian, and Japanese brethren as a priceless heritage from all the mighty labors of those who have gone before—when it is attacked from within and from without by the mightiest forces of evil ever gathered together for the destruction of mankind—will bear our share of the burden of its defense.

The time has come for our people after a long era of ease and peace in the enjoyment of the blessings of liberty and the rich fruits of a great new land to realize the vision which Milton had of them: "Methinks I see a mighty and a puissant people rousing itself as a strong man after sleep, as a young eagle mewing his immortal wing and lighting his undazzled eye in the full midday sun."

Those who have seen the glory in the faces of our young men leaving for the front, and know the love in the hearts of our women working for them at home, know that our race has not deteriorated, as some have said, and that in spite of the treason and anarchy of a few—barring some fatal blunder or weakness of our leaders in dealing with the national assassins in our midst or in marshaling our resources—these soldiers, with their heroic comrades of other lands, will return, carrying in safety, in triumph, and in honor the ark of the covenant of liberty and civilization.

There can be no holier obligation than that which this Government owes to these men who are giving their lives to this cause, to put down at once with an iron hand this propaganda of revolution at home and to strike dead as though with the thunderbolts of Jove every traitor who seeks to cut off supplies from our armies in the field.

HOUSING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the housing bill, H. R. 10265.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	New	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Harding	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Hollis	Nugent	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Smoot
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Sterling
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Swanson
Colt	Kellogg	Pittman	Thomas
Culberson	King	Poindexter	Tillman
Cummins	Lenroot	Pomerene	Trammell
Curtis	McCumber	Ransdell	Underwood
Fall	McKellar	Saulsbury	Watson
Fletcher	McLean	Shafroth	Williams
France	McNary	Sheppard	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	Martin	Sherman
Gallinger	Nelson	Shields

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. HENDERSON] is necessarily detained on official business.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] are detained on official business of the Senate.

Mr. BECKHAM. I wish to announce for the day that my colleague [Mr. JAMES] is absent on account of sickness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

TRIAL BY COURT-MARTIAL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have been off the floor for a few minutes. The morning business has been closed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; it has been declared closed. The Senator is recognized, however.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish the Senate would allow me, then, by unanimous consent, to offer a resolution about which I spoke to the Chair before I left the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the offering of the resolution at this time? There being none, the same will be offered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I send the resolution to the desk and ask that the Secretary read it.

The resolution (S. Res. 228) was read, as follows:

Whereas there is pending before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs a bill (S. 4364) to subject to trial by court-martial persons who endanger the good discipline, order, movements, health, safety, or successful operations of the land or naval forces of the United States by acting as spies in time of war in the United States, and for other purposes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, instructed to report to the Senate whether or not in its opinion any of the provisions of said bill are in violation of any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SWANSON. What is the request?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The resolution is a resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee of the Senate to report to the Senate whether any of the provisions of Senate bill 4364, providing for the trial of people accused of the violation of the espionage act and some other acts Congress has passed, by court-martial instead of in the civil courts, are violative of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution if it does not interfere with the few minutes I have for the consideration of the housing bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If there is any objection, I will let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. NELSON. I would suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that a far better way would be to have the bill referred to the Judiciary Committee. It is in charge of the Committee on Military Affairs, and to have that committee discharged from the consideration of it and have it referred to the Judiciary Committee, I think, would be more appropriate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree entirely with the Senator that the bill ought to have gone to the Judiciary Committee originally. It simply bristles with constitutional questions and in my opinion is absolutely violative of every guaranty contained in the Constitution as to trial by jury and individual liberty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit an interruption by the Chair?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 3771) authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

Mr. SWANSON. Permit me to make an inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will allow me to finish a sentence in response to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], then I will yield to the Senator. The only reason why I took this method was because the bill was introduced by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. It is his own bill and was referred to his own committee and I felt that it might be a little disrespectful to him to ask that it be taken away from his committee and sent to the Judiciary Committee. I am perfectly willing that that should be done, but the Senator from Oregon is not on the floor.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I have requested a page to find the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and I think he will be here very soon.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. In view of the absence of the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, will the Senator permit the resolution to go over until to-morrow at any rate, so that he can be here?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think he is in his committee room. I saw him a few minutes ago.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been trying to find him and could not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think he will be here before I complete my remarks. If not, I will be glad to comply with the request of the Senator from Tennessee.

The Senate Committee on Military Affairs has already had hearings on this bill to some extent. I went there by invitation of one of the members of the committee on Saturday afternoon hoping to hear some of the testimony which was being given in favor of the bill, but there were no witnesses there. There was an informal discussion among members of the committee, and I was permitted to remain. There seemed to be some members of the committee who were earnestly in favor of the bill. It seemed to me that if we got the judgment of the Judiciary Committee as to its constitutionality and the Senate Committee on Military Affairs would defer action upon it until after the opinion of the Judiciary Committee could be had, the same result would be accomplished; but I am perfectly willing that any Senator should substitute another motion for this resolution or make an amendment to it, if he wants to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suppose the Senator knows from having heard some remarks I made in committee on this very subject that I am inclined to agree with him. I do not think the bill will have to be referred to any other committee to ascertain whether it is constitutional or not. It seems to me it is perfectly patent and plain that it is unconstitutional. However, it seems to me under the wording of the bill it was entirely proper that the bill should have been sent to the Military Affairs Committee, and I would prefer not to have its jurisdiction ousted until the chairman is here, at any rate. I hope the Senator will let the resolution go over.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, the reference was proper enough in a certain way; it has to do with military affairs, because it provides for the trial of civilians by courts-martial, a thing that has never been tolerated in a civilized community that I am aware of. With the country calm and the courts wide open and no invasion and not the foot of an enemy on the continent of America anywhere, to ignore the courts and pass a bill which will allow a file of soldiers to march into your library where you are reading in the evening and drag you out to a military camp and stand you up against a stone wall and shoot you or hang you because you may have said something disrespectful of the administration or the form of government is a proposition so heinous and abhorrent to any Anglo-Saxon at least that I could not entertain it for a minute.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN entered the Chamber.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I see the Senator from Oregon is now here. I am offering a resolution to ask the opinion of the Judiciary Committee as to the constitutionality of the so-called Chamberlain bill. If the Senator has any objection to it, of course I will let it go over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the bill that the resolution refers to has already been submitted to the Military Affairs Committee, and I do not see why the legal aspect of it should now be referred to some other committee. Without questioning the ability of any member of the Judiciary Committee, we have some very distinguished lawyers on the Military Affairs Committee. We have the benefit of the advice, if we want it, of the Attorney General of the United States, as well as the benefit of any opinion that we might want to call upon the Judge Advocate General for.

I think it would be rather a poor compliment to the Military Affairs Committee to have some other committee pass upon the constitutionality of an act that it has under consideration. I assume that the Military Affairs Committee would not knowingly report a bill that it thought was unconstitutional after hearings had upon it any more than the Judiciary Committee would report out such a bill, and I assume that in the discharge of its duty it would satisfy itself about that before it made any report at all.

I think, Mr. President, I shall have to object to the resolution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am surprised, very much surprised, that the Senator would object to obtaining the opinion of the Judiciary Committee, which contains 18 of the lawyers of the Senate, upon a bill which proposes to revise the system of jurisprudence in this country, which changes the whole court system of the country. But if the Senator objects, of course, I can not control that, and the resolution will have to go over until the following day. I give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow morning and ask the Senate to act upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over.

HOUSING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who has charge of the pending unfinished business, if he will give way to take up what is commonly known as the housing bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. I would be glad to oblige the Senator, but I made a promise that if the Senate would give unanimous consent to limit debate on and after Wednesday I would keep the unfinished business before the Senate, and I feel compelled to keep that promise.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to give notice that as soon as the regular morning business is concluded to-morrow I shall move to proceed with the further consideration of the housing measure.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yielded to the Senator from Virginia——

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I merely wish to say, in view of what the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] said, that I shall insist on taking a recess in lieu of an adjournment to-day. I made the motion for an adjournment on Friday so that the Senator from Virginia could bring up his bill in the morning hour to-day, but, of course, the morning hour was taken up with speeches.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator will move an adjournment this afternoon?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I could not do that.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the agreement require the Senate to take a recess?

Mr. OVERMAN. I did agree that if the Senate would give the unanimous consent I requested, I would keep the bill constantly before the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. I can not consent that the bill I have in charge shall have no chance of passing at an early day. I consider it to be one of the most important measures demanding action. It will increase the production of munitions by 25 to 50 per cent, and prevent delay in the whole business of fulfilling contracts for munitions of all kinds. Do I understand that until the Overman bill is disposed of it is to be kept constantly before the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. Unless there is some objection, I shall have to do it. If there is any objection——

Mr. SWANSON. I shall object, and there will have to be a quorum to vote on the question if the Senator insists upon a recess rather than an adjournment.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has that right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has the floor.

WAR AGAINST BULGARIA AND TURKEY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before we become further involved in a dispute between the two bills, I ask the consent of the Senate to offer a resolution, which I ask the Secretary to read. I will let it go over until to-morrow morning, when I give notice that I shall call it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 229), as follows:

Whereas S. J. Res. 145, to declare a state of war between the United States of America and the Governments of Bulgaria and of Turkey, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations on April 2, 1918: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations is requested to give said resolution its early consideration and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will let the resolution go over until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will go over under the rule, without prejudice, until to-morrow.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 20th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 383) to punish the willful injury or destruction of war material, or of war premises or utilities used in connection with war material, and for other purposes.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 10854. An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORT OF ALASKAN ENGINEERING COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Territories:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the report of the Alaskan Engineering Commission for the year ended December 31, 1917.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 22, 1918.

REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3771) authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, the present Congress has made a record in the multiplicity, variety, and importance of legislation enacted never before accomplished in threefold the same time. The work it has done has not been equaled by any preceding Congress and will not be surpassed by any future Congress in volume and importance. The laws imposing taxes and providing for revenue and the appropriations for the current expenses of the Government, civil and military, not only exceed those heretofore imposed and made by the United States but those of any nation in the world within the same limited time. The laws for raising, equipping, and arming an army and providing a navy, for constructing a large merchant marine and fleets of airplanes are without a parallel in military affairs. In addition to these, many important bills concerning and affecting the personal conduct and property rights of the 110,000,000 of American citizens and of vital importance to good government in peace and war and necessary for the perpetuity and maintenance of our free institutions and the independence of our country, have been carefully considered and placed upon the statute books. The splendid manner in which the President and executive departments have met the responsibilities imposed by this legislation and discharged the numerous, varied, and important duties required of them can not be too highly commended.

Mr. President, when we consider the magnitude of the work of transforming a great Nation, engaged in agricultural, manufacturing, commercial, and other industrial pursuits, developing the great natural resources of their country, fostering education, advancing civilization, the cause of humanity, religious and political liberty, with their hearts filled with the love of their fellow men and the fear of God, from the paths of profound peace to a state of war, full of personal and financial sacrifice, and impending loss of the health, limbs, and lives of hundreds of thousands, and even more, of their best and noblest young men, we wonder how it has been within the power of men to accomplish it within so short a time and with the marvelous efficiency it has been done.

History will record this wonderful achievement as the greatest and most important ever accomplished by any nation so thoroughly and successfully within the compass of a year.

I will not go into the details of this stupendous work of the President and Congress, for the facts are known to all well-informed Americans.

Mr. President, while this great transformation of our country from peace to war has been in the main successful, there have been some serious mistakes and delays and some want of efficient management that have unhappily occurred in the preparation of our country for national defense and carrying on the war against Germany, and extraordinary legislation is required to meet the situation.

The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, after examining many civil and military officers and advising with a number of distinguished citizens, members of the advisory board of the Council of National Defense, framed and reported to the Senate a bill commonly known as the war-cabinet bill, which they believed would prevent the delays and the inefficiencies found to exist and afford relief from those conditions.

The bill under consideration, commonly known as the Overman bill, as I understand the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], in charge of it, to state, was prepared under the direction of the President and introduced by that Senator for the same purpose.

The war-cabinet bill has been recommitted, and the other is now before the Senate for final action.

These bills propose extraordinary legislation demanded by extraordinary and crucial conditions confronting the country. They seek to accomplish the same ends, differing chiefly in the repository of the powers to be conferred for those purposes.

It will be somewhat tedious to the Senate, but I believe the importance of this legislation will justify a brief analysis of these bills and a comparison of their respective provisions.

I will first call attention to the provisions of these bills separately and discuss some general objections that have been made to their constitutionality and the policy and necessity for such legislation.

THE WAR-CABINET BILL.

Mr. President, I think that the provisions of the war-cabinet bill violate the fundamental law by encroaching upon the constitutional powers of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

I will read so much of the bill as bears upon the questions I will discuss:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created a war cabinet, to be composed of three distinguished citizens of demonstrated executive ability, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, through which war cabinet the President may exercise such of the powers conferred upon him by the Constitution and the laws of the United States, as are hereinafter mentioned and described.

SEC. 2. That said war cabinet shall have jurisdiction and authority as follows:

(a) To consider, devise, and formulate plans and policies, general and special, for the effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the existing war, and, in the manner hereinafter prescribed, to direct and procure the execution of the same.

(b) To supervise, coordinate, direct, and control the functions and agencies of the Government in so far as, in the judgment of the war cabinet, it may be necessary or advisable so to do for the effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the existing war.

(c) To consider and determine upon its own motion or upon submission to it, subject to review by the President, all differences and questions relating to the conduct and prosecution of the war that may arise between any such departments, officials, and agencies of the Government.

(d) To require information from and utilize the services of any or all executive departments and executives, officers, and agents of the United States and of the several States and Territories, and of the District of Columbia, or helpful in the proper performance of the duties of said war cabinet.

(e) In the exercise of the jurisdiction and authority hereby conferred to make, subject to review by the President, the necessary orders to any such departments, bureau, official, or agency of the Government, and such decisions as the matters under consideration may require or warrant.

(f) To make rules and regulations governing its own procedure; and said war cabinet shall, upon completion of its membership, immediately organize and thereupon and thereafter proceed to an expeditious disposition of all matters coming before it.

The first section provides for the creation of a war cabinet, through which "the President may exercise such of the powers conferred on him by the Constitution and laws of the United States, as are mentioned and described in the bill."

The word "may," as the context and subsequent provisions of the bill clearly show, is used in the sense of "shall," and the powers of the President referred to are those conferred upon him by the Constitution in general as Chief Executive and specifically as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

The second section provides that the war cabinet shall have jurisdiction and authority to consider, devise, and formulate plans and policies, general and special, for the effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the war, and to direct and procure the execution of the same; and to supervise, coordinate, direct, and control the functions and activities of all executive departments, officials, and agencies of the Government in so far as, in the judgment of the war cabinet, it may be necessary and advisable so to do for the effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the war.

The powers here conferred are absolute, without reference to the views or will of the President, and would entirely supersede him in the conduct of the war.

The war cabinet could take absolute charge of the conduct and prosecution of the war. The President would not have the authority to initiate or formulate any plans or policies for its prosecution. His power as Commander in Chief would be destroyed. He would be subject to the orders of the war cabinet.

The Constitution declares that "all legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States"; that "all executive powers shall be vested in the President"; and that "judicial powers of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish," and it is familiar law that these three departments are separate, coordinate, and independent and their respective powers can not be exercised or limited by the others.

The Constitution does not define legislative, executive, and judicial powers, and they must be determined by their inherent nature and the principles of our institutions. Certain powers are also specifically mentioned and conferred upon each of the departments, although they would have them under the general terms used, thus emphasizing the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the particular department should have those powers.

Among these specific powers expressly conferred is that contained in Article II, providing that the "President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into actual service of the United States."

It will not be out of place to read in this connection from a commentator whose opinions on American constitutional law are accepted as authority by all branches of our Government.

In Black's Constitutional Law (sec. 69) it is said:

> In time of peace the President has two sets of duties to discharge with reference to the Army and Navy. First, he is the Commander in Chief, and as such must exercise supreme and unhindered control. Secondly, he "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and in pursuance of this duty he must give due effect to the acts of Congress which concern the Military and Naval Establishments. Congress has power to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain the Navy, and to make rules for the government and regulations of the land and naval forces. Under these grants of authority it may clearly regulate the enlistment of soldiers and sailors, prescribe the number, rank, and pay of officers, provide for and regulate arms, ships, forts, arsenals, the organization of the land and naval forces, courts-martial, military offenses, and their punishment, and the like. And all these laws and regulations the President is to carry into effect not in his character as Commander in Chief but as a part of his general executive duty, and with as great or as little choice of means and methods as Congress may see fit to confide in him. But, again, in virtue of his rank, as head of the force, he has certain powers and duties with which Congress can not interfere. For instance, he may regulate the movements of the armies and the stationing of them at various posts. So also he may direct the movements of the vessels of the Navy, sending them wherever, in his judgment, it is expedient. Neither here nor in a state of war is there any necessary conflict. The President has no power to declare war. That belongs exclusively to Congress. But when war has been declared, or when it is recognized as actually existing, then his functions as Commander in Chief become of the highest importance, and his operation in that character are entirely beyond the control of the Legislature. It is true that Congress must still "raise and support" the Army and provide and maintain a Navy, and it is true that the power of furnishing or withholding the necessary means and supplies may give it an indirect influence on the conduct of the war. But the supreme command belongs to the President alone. In theory he plans all campaigns, establishes all blockades and sieges, directs all marches, fights all battles.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to ask my colleague whether he considers that the powers granted to the President under this bill are powers that pertain to him in his executive capacity or powers that pertain to him in his capacity as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy?

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand the powers proposed to be confided to the President under the Overman bill are chiefly executive powers and not those which he has as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. What I am now especially discussing are the provisions of the war-cabinet bill, which cover the authority of the President as Chief Executive and as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

The authorities conclusively show that while Congress has the power to declare war, raise and support armies, provide and maintain a navy, and to enact laws for the organization and discipline of these forces and of the militia, the power to command, control, and direct them is executive and is by the Constitution specifically vested in the President as Commander in Chief, and, further, that this power is plenary, absolute, and supreme, and can not be taken from him and conferred upon others or in any way limited or controlled.

It has been said that the provisions of the first section, that the President "may" exercise such of the powers conferred upon him by the Constitution and the laws of the United States, through the war cabinet, applies to all subsequent sections of the bill, and therefore the war cabinet acts merely as his agent, and he is not limited or superseded in the exercise of his constitutional powers.

I do not think this construction can be sustained, because subsections (a) and (b) expressly confer upon the war cabinet the authority to initiate as well as to supervise, direct, control, and execute all plans and policies for the vigorous prosecution of the war.

The word "may," as here used, must be construed to mean "shall," because the clear intent of the language of the bill is that the war cabinet created shall exercise the functions and activities therein outlined. The President is left no discretion concerning the conduct of the war or the instrumentalities he shall use or the plans he shall pursue. He must act through the cabinet upon plans and policies initiated and to be executed by it. Clearly this would allow the war cabinet to share with the President the executive powers conferred upon him by the Constitution.

But if the construction placed upon the bill by its authors be conceded to be true, or if amended so as to provide that the President shall exercise all the powers proposed to be conferred upon the war cabinet through that body, the infirmities I have pointed out will not be cured. The powers conferred by the Constitution upon the President as Chief Executive and as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy are, as I have stated, plenary and absolute, and he can not be limited or restricted in the execution of them; but he has the right to determine the manner and instrumentalities through which he will discharge the duties of his high office.

This is eminently true concerning his powers as Commander in Chief, because the very nature of this office imperatively requires that in the exercise of the powers conferred and the discharge of duties to be performed he shall have unlimited discretion and supreme power. The framers of the Constitution clearly intended to centralize all the power over our armed forces in the Chief Executive by expressly providing that he should be Commander in Chief, thus recognizing the experience of all nations that war can not be conducted without absolute, if not despotic, power being concentrated in one single head.

If Congress had the power to create a war cabinet to initiate and formulate plans and policies for the President and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in the discharge of his duties it could do so itself and thus assume all of his functions and powers and exercise absolute control of the Army and Navy and the conduct of the war. There can be no distinction between partial limitations either as to the means and instrumentalities used by the Chief Executive in the discharge of his duties and the absolute control of them.

The absolute power of the President as Commander in Chief is vital to the very existence of the Nation and must not be interfered with in any manner.

But it may be said that the powers proposed to be conferred upon the council or cabinet are not directly over the President, but the heads of the departments and subordinate officers. This position is not tenable. The provisions of section 1 and subsections (a) and (b) of section 2 directly affect the powers of the President and supersede them.

The other sections of the bill do directly authorize the war cabinet to adjust all differences that may arise between the departments, officials, and agencies of the Government and utilize the services of any and all executive departments, executive officers, and agents of the United States and the several States, and to make and issue orders for the control of all of the departments of the Government, subject only to review by the President. In other words, the President is deprived of the power to control the executive officers and departments and to initiate plans and policies for the prosecution of the war, and can do nothing more than approve or disapprove those formulated by the war cabinet. What sort of a Commander in Chief would he be with such limited powers?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not suppose the Senator contends that Congress has not power to create Cabinet officials and to define their duties?

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly not.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then, if this war-cabinet bill should be construed to be simply permissive—in other words, if the word "may" is given its natural meaning—the bill would be constitutional, would it not?

Mr. SHIELDS. That would relieve to some extent the encroachment upon the powers and prerogatives of the President, but not entirely, because there can be no restriction and no limitation and no embarrassment of the absolute powers vested in him.

Mr. KELLOGG. But if the President is left free to exercise his powers as the Executive, and simply to use a war cabinet the same as he uses any other members of the Cabinet, there can not be any doubt about the power of Congress to create such a Cabinet official.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly not. That is the question the Senator from Minnesota asked me a few moments ago, and to which I made the same answer; but such are not the provisions of this bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well. The Senator from Tennessee is aware of the rule of construction, that such a construction will be placed upon a law as to make it constitutional if it is possible to so construe the language. If the construction is placed upon this bill simply that it is permissive, so far as the President is concerned, to exercise his powers through this cabinet, then the bill would be constitutional. I say nothing about the wisdom of it, but simply speak of its constitutionality.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator is correct in his statement of the rule of construction. The rule announced by him is well established, but still his suggestion does not meet the infirmities of this bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. By the expression "this bill" I take it the Senator from Tennessee does not refer to the so-called Overman bill, but to the war-cabinet bill?

Mr. SHIELDS. I have so expressly stated. I am now discussing the war-cabinet bill.

There can be no doubt but that these sections of the bill also directly affect and limit the powers of the President. The broad language of the provisions conferring powers on the war cabinet cover both civil and military establishments, and include the Secretaries of all the departments, all generals and admirals, and other officers of the Army and Navy. These are all the agents of the President and through whom he must exercise his authority.

As said by Judge Miller in his lectures upon the Constitution:

> The Secretaries of the War Department and the heads of all other departments are the executive managers and agents discharging the function of the executive office under the control and with the consent of the President.

The control of these agents would be the control of the President, for the control of the agent necessarily is the control of the principal.

The President was clearly right in objecting to this bill. While chosen by the people to exercise the powers and perform the duties of the highest office in their gift, and charged with the faithful and efficient execution of them, he would, under its provisions, be unable to do so in this great emergency confronting the country, and would have no part of consequence in conducting the war for national defense. The creation of a commission with such high and sweeping powers would, in effect, abolish the office of Chief Executive and Commander in Chief, change our form of government, and create intolerable conditions.

THE OVERMAN BILL.

Now, let us examine the provisions of the bill under consideration which are intended to concentrate all administrative powers into a single executive head to secure unity of plan and promptness of decision and execution.

Its effective and operative sections are much the same as those of the war cabinet bill, and are as follows:

> That for the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, for the better utilization of resources and industries, and for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration by the President of his powers as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces, the President is hereby authorized to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act, and to this end is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as he may deem necessary.
> SEC. 2. That in carrying out the purposes of this act the President is authorized to utilize, coordinate, or consolidate any executive or administrative commissions, bureaus, agencies, offices, or officers now existing by law, to transfer any duties or powers from one existing department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer to another, to transfer the personnel thereof, or any part of it, either by detail or assignment, together with the whole or any part of the records and public property belonging thereto.
> SEC. 3. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act any moneys heretofore and hereafter appropriated for the use of any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer shall be expended only for the purposes for which it was appropriated under the direction of such other agency as may be directed by the President hereunder to perform and execute said function.

Mr. President, the first question I will consider is whether legislation is necessary to accomplish the purposes of this bill. There are distinguished Senators who think it is not, but, as I understand them, their conclusions are based on widely different views of the source of the power of the President in such matters. There are those who believe that the President has the right to exercise all the powers proposed to be conferred in the bill and much more under what they call "the war power" supposed to be vested in him as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy; and there are others who, I understand, think he has these powers as the depository of all executive power under article 2 of the Constitution and perhaps some existing statutes.

I can not agree with any of these views, and believe that the purposes and objects for which the bill was introduced can not be effected without its enactment into law.

I can not agree with the distinguished Senators who, in substance, express the opinion that the President, by virtue of his constitutional position as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, in time of war is vested with all the powers of government to enable him to successfully prosecute the war. The Senators interpret the provision that "the President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States and of the militia of the several States when called into active service of the United States," to confer these extraordinary and absolute powers. They seem, in reading the clause of the Constitution ordaining that "the President shall be Commander in Chief," to have stopped with these words and not observed that such authority is confined to the Army and Navy and the militia when in Federal service. The President is not made Commander in Chief of any department of the Government.

Mr. President, that President Lincoln exercised powers for which he, as Chief Executive of the Republic or as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, had no warrant under the Constitution, as stated during the progress of this debate, in the conduct of the Civil War, does not justify his successors in doing the same thing. President Wilson will follow no such precedent; he will usurp no power. When he finds that he has no authority to do things which conditions and the vigorous prosecution of the war require to be done, he comes to Congress, as in this case, and asks for the authority, and I believe that in every instance it has been granted.

Mr. President, I do not agree with those who are of the opinion that republics are not so constituted that they can successfully make war and certainly that is not the case with our form of government. History, past and current, has proven and is now demonstrating that we can successfully wage war upon a large scale and with efficiency never excelled by any nation in any age. I believe this can be done within constitutional limitations and with due regard to the separation of governmental powers into three distinct and independent departments.

The Constitution was made for peace and war. The Colonies or States had just emerged from eight years of bloody and exhaustive war when it was formulated, and those who gathered together to do this great work were familiar with all the difficulties the Continental Congress and our military commanders had encountered in the conduct of that war and had in mind future wars with which they were threatened, and years of peace which they hoped for, as well as the development of the commerce and great natural resources of this great country. They provided a Government for the contingencies and necessities of peace and war, combining the necessary powers for both conditions in the same instrument. The provisions for government in peace and those for command in war come from the same high source. They are of equal dignity, of equal authority, and are equally sacred and independent in their respective spheres and jurisdictions and must all be construed together, harmonized, and executed without encroachment on each other.

There is no question in my mind that the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, under the Constitution and statutory authority given him by Congress, and that which should and can be given him, will have all the powers necessary to enable him to conduct this great war to a victorious conclusion without the violation of any principle of the Constitution. If he has not now sufficient authority to prosecute the war with that speed and efficiency necessary to victory, Congress has the power to give it to him and should do so ungrudgingly and promptly.

There are other Senators, who, I understand, are of the opinion that the President as the Chief Executive of the Republic and by statute has power to do the things provided in the pending bill, but so far they have not given any definite statement of their views nor pointed out the statutes which they think confer this power.

The President has very large powers over the heads of several executive departments, as the Chief Executive of the Nation, whether in war or in peace, and they and their subordinates where not otherwise provided by law are subject to his direction and control.

But the executive heads of departments have other powers than those which they obtain as the representatives and agents of the Chief Executive. Congress has, from time to time, conferred upon them and, in many instances, their subordinates or chiefs of bureaus powers which the Secretaries must execute independent and free from the control of the President, and which the chiefs of bureaus are bound to perform independent of the will of the head of the department, and are responsible only to the law for their action.

In the case of the United States v. Symonds (120 U. S., p. 30, L. Ed., p. 558) it is said:

> The authority of the Secretary to issue orders, regulations, and instructions, with the approval of the President, in reference to matters connected with the Naval Establishment, is subject to the condition, necessarily implied, that they must be consistent with the statutes which have been enacted by Congress in reference to the Navy. He may, with the approval of the President, establish regulations in execution of, or supplementary to, but not in conflict with, the statutes defining his powers or conferring rights upon others. The contrary has never been held by this court.

And in the case of Kendall v. The United States (12 Pet., 610), where the direct questions arose in a mandamus proceeding against the Postmaster General to compel him to exercise a power and perform a duty imposed upon him by Congress, it was said:

> The executive power is vested in a President, and as far as his powers are derived from the Constitution he is beyond the reach of any other department, except in the mode prescribed by the Constitution through the impeaching power. But it by no means follows that every officer in every branch of that department is under the exclusive direction of the President. Such a principle, we apprehend, is not, and certainly can not be, claimed by the President.
> There are certain political duties imposed upon many officers in the executive department, the discharge of which is under the direction of the President. But it would be an alarming doctrine that Congress can not impose upon any executive officer any duty they may think proper, which is not repugnant to any rights secured and protected by the Constitution; and in such cases the duty and responsibility grow out of and are subject to the control of the law and not to the direction of the President. And this is emphatically the case where the duty enjoined is of a mere ministerial character.

Now, let us briefly examine the statutes creating the several executive departments, their officers, subordinates, and employees and conferring upon them general and special powers and duties, and see how far these departments and their officers are subject to the direction and control of the President and how far they are controlled by statutory law which neither they nor the President can ignore or violate.

The original statute creating the War Department was enacted August 7, 1789. It was provided in that statute:

> The Secretary of War shall perform such duties as shall from time to time be enjoined on or intrusted to him by the President relative to military commissions, the military forces, the warlike stores of the United States, or to other matters respecting military affairs; and he shall conduct the business of the department in such manner as the President shall direct.

Thus absolute power was by the original statute given the President over the Secretary of War and the War Department, but subsequently, by express statutes amending it, much of the power of the Secretary of War has been conferred directly upon him and, in some instances, upon his subordinates, so that in these matters these officers are not subject to the control or direction of the President. One of these was passed in 1814, and is found as section 219 of the Revised Statutes. It reads:

> SEC. 219. The Secretary of War shall from time to time define and prescribe the kinds as well as the amount of supplies to be purchased by the Subsistence and Quartermaster Departments of the Army, and the duties and powers thereof respecting such purchases; and shall prescribe general regulations for the transportation of the articles of supply from the places of purchase to the several armies, garrisons, posts, and recruiting places, for the safe-keeping of such articles, and for the distribution of an adequate and timely supply of the same to the regimental quartermasters, and to such other officers as may by virtue of such regulations be intrusted with the same; and shall fix and make reasonable allowances for the store rent and storage necessary for the safe-keeping of all military stores and supplies.
> SEC. 220. The transportation of troops, munitions of war, equipments, military property, and stores throughout the United States shall be under the immediate control and supervision of the Secretary of War and such agents as he may appoint.

The statutes creating and fixing the duties of the Secretary of the Navy closely follow the same lines as those creating the War Department. I will not consume time to read them.

The validity of these statutes and their force and effect have come before the courts in a number of cases in mandamus proceedings instituted against the Secretaries or some subordinate to compel them to perform some duty imposed, and the proceedings were sustained over the contention that it was an executive power or function of the President and could not be controlled by the judiciary, because it was a duty fixed by statute which Congress had the power to enact.

It will be found upon examination of the statutes that the heads of all the executive departments have their duties fixed by statute, and in order for the President to control them there must be some legislation of the character proposed by the present bill.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF THE BILL.

But the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] says that the blanket power proposed by the bill to authorize the President to coordinate the powers and duties and transfer the functions of officers and agents in the several departments of the Government can not be legally conferred; that it would be a delegation of legislative power to the Executive.

The Senator is a very able lawyer and his opinions are always entitled to the greatest respect and most serious consideration, but I think he has fallen into error upon this question.

I agree with the Senator that the powers of the Federal Government are by the Constitution divided into three great coordinate and independent departments, and that no one of these departments can be given or can exercise those powers solely confided to either of the other departments.

Theoretically, the legislative power is that to make, amend, and repeal; the executive, that to administer and enforce; and the judicial, that to interpret and apply laws.

In the writings of Montesquieu and other political scientists much consulted when the first American constitutions were framed and adopted, it is said, in substance, that the absolute separation of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments are essential to a republican form of government and necessary for the perpetuation and maintenance of the political liberties of the people. But the framers of the Federal Constitution and those of a great majority, if not all, of the States departed from this theoretical division of the powers of government, and in many important matters vested in each of them powers and authority that in strictness would belong exclusively to the others; and in some instances all departments are vested with the same power to be exercised concerning different matters, and this is especially noticeable in the vestiture of political and administrative powers. This is obvious from an examination of those several instruments, and has been frequently referred to in judicial decisions.

There are also powers which partake of the nature of both the legislative and executive, and may be conferred upon and exercised by either of these departments with equal propriety and equal safety to the rights of the people.

Judge Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitations, page 157, says:

> If it is difficult to point out the precise boundary which separates legislative from judicial duties, it is still more difficult to discriminate, in particular cases, between what is properly legislative and what is properly executive duty. The authority that makes the law has large discretion in determining the means through which they shall be executed, and the performance of many duties which they may provide for by the law they may refer either to the chief executive of the State, or, at their option, to any other executive or ministerial officer, or even to a person specially named for the duty. What can be definitely said on this subject is this: That such powers as are specially conferred by the constitution upon the governor, or upon any other specified officer, the legislature can not require or authorize to be performed by any other officer or authority, and from these duties which the constitution requires of him he can not be excused by law. But other powers or duties the executive can not exercise or assume to except by legislative authority, and the power which in its discretion it confers it may also, in its discretion, withhold or confide to other hands.

In Hovey v. State (119 Ind., 395, 21 N. E., 21), it is said:

> The boundaries which separate the functions of the different departments are broad, clear, and distinct, as applied to matters affecting property rights or private concern, or the execution or enforcement of existing law; but it is not easy, where the Constitution is silent, to discriminate or formulate definitions as to what constitutes legislative, executive, and judicial authority when questions of public policy, or which relate to the best means and agencies for accomplishing a governmental end, or of executing the law, are involved.

While the Congress has the sole power to legislate, and can not delegate it, it has other powers in their nature administrative and political which it may confer upon the Executive or the judiciary, or upon commissions or other agencies created by it.

POWERS CONFERRED ARE ADMINISTRATIVE.

The constitutional principle which the Senator from Iowa relies upon does not refer to administrative powers. These may be delegated to whomsoever and in such form as the Congress may deem wise and proper. Whether the power is legislative or administrative depends upon its nature and substance and not upon the manner and form in which it is conferred. The Congress acts in the form of joint and concurrent resolutions and bills, but these are not always legislative acts.

The powers proposed to be conferred upon the Chief Executive by the provisions of the pending bill are not legislative in their character and effect, but clearly administrative. They are very similar to the authority conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture to make rules and regulations for the government of the forest reserves, which was attacked upon the ground that it was a delegation of the legislative power. The validity of the legislation as an administrative measure was upheld in the case of The United States v. Grimald (220 U. S., 563), from which I will read briefly:

Congress was merely conferring administrative functions upon an agent and not delegating to him legislative power. The authority actually given was much less than what has been granted to municipalities by virtue of which they make by-laws, ordinances, and regulations for the government of towns and cities. Such ordinances do not declare general rules with reference to rights of persons and property, nor do they create or regulate obligations and liabilities, nor declare what shall be crimes nor fix penalties therefor.

By whatever name they are called, they refer to matters of local management and local police. They are "not of a legislative character in the highest sense of the term, and as an owner may delegate to his principal agents the right to employ subordinates, giving to them a limited discretion, so it would seem that Congress might rightfully intrust to the local legislature (authorities) the determination of minor matters."

It must be admitted that it is difficult to define the line which separates legislative power to make laws from administrative authority to make regulations. This difficulty has often been recognized, and was referred to by Chief Justice Marshall in Wayman v. Southard (10 Wheat., 42; 6 L. Ed., 262), where he was considering the authority of courts to make rules. He there said: "It will not be contended that Congress can delegate to the courts or to any other tribunals powers which are strictly and exclusively legislative. But Congress may certainly delegate to others powers which the legislature may rightfully exercise itself." What were these nonlegislative powers which Congress could exercise but which might also be delegated to others was not determined, for he said: "The line has not been exactly drawn which separates those important subjects, which must be entirely regulated by the legislature itself, from those of less interest, in which a general provision may be made, and power given to those who are to act under such general provisions to fill up the details."

From the beginning of the Government various acts have been passed conferring upon executive officers power to make rules and regulations—not for the government of their departments but for administering the laws which did govern. None of these statutes could confer legislative power. But when Congress had legislated and indicated its will it could give to those who were to act under such general provisions "power to fill up the details" by the establishment of administrative rules and regulations, the violation of which could be punished by fine or imprisonment fixed by Congress, or penalties fixed by Congress, or measured by the injury done.

The bill does not propose to empower the President to create new functions or do other things than are now provided for by law, but merely to provide agents, agencies, and methods for the performance of functions, the discharge of duties, and the execution of things already authorized and provided for. No rights are created, no liabilities are imposed, and no penalties denounced. Every element of authority proposed to be vested is absolutely administrative and within the power of Congress either to exercise directly or indirectly, through any agent or agency it may select or create.

The powers here proposed to be conferred on the President are not as broad or as important as those conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission and upon the Federal Trade Commission, which are a combination of the legislative, judicial, and executive, and materially affect the conduct and the property rights of thousands of people. They are no broader than the powers which were conferred upon the President over the State, War, and Navy Departments when they were first created, for in these departments he was authorized to do the very things proposed in this bill. Indeed, this bill merely restores to the President the power over these departments which was originally conferred upon him when they were first organized.

I will read from the Revised Statutes. Concerning the State Department:

SEC. 202. The Secretary of State shall perform such duties as shall from time to time be enjoined on or intrusted to him by the President relative to correspondences, commissions, or instructions to or with public ministers or consuls from the United States, or to negotiations with public ministers from foreign States or princes, or to memorials or other applications from foreign public ministers or other foreigners, or to such other matters respecting foreign affairs as the President of the United States shall assign to the department, and he shall conduct the business of the department in such manner as the President shall direct.

Concerning the War Department, it was provided:

SEC. 216. The Secretary of War shall perform such duties as shall from time to time be enjoined on or intrusted to him by the President relative to military commissions, the military forces, the warlike stores of the United States, or to other matters respecting military affairs; and he shall conduct the business of the department in such manner as the President shall direct.

And concerning the Navy Department, we find:

SEC. 417. The Secretary of the Navy shall execute such orders as he shall receive from the President relative to the procurement of naval stores and materials, and the construction, armament, equipment, and employment of vessels of war, as well as all other matters connected with the Naval Establishment.

The powers which the bill proposes to confer upon the President are no broader than those given to the Secretaries of State, War, and Navy over their departmental affairs and agencies by the statutes creating these offices in 1789, shortly after the Constitution was ratified by the States. I will read from the Revised Statutes sections Nos. 161 and 166, applicable to all departments:

SEC. 161. The head of each department is authorized to prescribe regulations, not inconsistent with law, for the government of his department, the conduct of its officers and clerks, the distribution and performance of its business, and the custody, use, and preservation of the records, papers, and property appertaining to it.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 166. Each head of a department may from time to time alter the distribution among the various bureaus and offices of his department, of the clerks allowed by law, as he may find it necessary and proper to do.

Again, the authority proposed to be given is more of the nature of the appointive power, which is peculiarly executive, than the legislative power, for the substance and effect of the bill is to authorize the President to appoint agents or agencies already existing, to perform certain functions and duties now provided by law.

The power to transfer functions of one department or bureau to another department or bureau is nothing more than the appointment of the head of the department or chief of the bureau to which the same are transferred to perform those functions.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is clearly mistaken in his conception that this bill delegates legislative powers and for that reason would be violative of the fundamental law. This bill creates no rights, it creates no offenses or penalties, but merely provides for the appointment of officers to discharge certain administrative duties already created and fully defined.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have listened with great interest to the very able argument that the Senator from Tennessee has just made touching the constitutionality of this bill. Anything that the Senator has to say upon a constitutional question always invites my very studious attention. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not think the constitutionality of this bill rests—I think he perhaps indicated this—more strongly upon the last point he has just made in arguing the question than upon the first; that is to say, it rests more strongly upon the power of the President to appoint to office than upon the power of the President to confer administrative powers in the way of making rules, and so forth? My thought, as I have considered this bill, was about as follows: That when we speak of transferring a function from one officer to another it is tantamount to saying that, conversely, instead of taking the function to the officer the President is directed to take the officer to the function, namely, to appoint the officer to do that particular thing, and under the Constitution, of course, the President may be vested with authority to appoint without the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I think the legislation can be sustained upon either ground—that they are merely administrative powers or that the power is that of appointment.

Mr. President, I have read the war-cabinet bill and the Overman bill, and to some extent compared and explained their provisions. I do not deem it necessary to make any elaborate comparison of the powers proposed to be conferred by these bills, respectively, nor to point out in detail wherein those provided for in the war-cabinet bill exceed in importance, force, and effect those found in the Overman bill, for they are obvious to all Senators. I will direct attention to only some of the points of similarity and difference.

The war-cabinet bill proposes to vest great and extraordinary powers in three distinguished citizens to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who are now unknown to anyone and yet to be selected, while the powers proposed to be conferred by the Overman bill are confided to the Chief Executive of the Nation, in peace and in war, charged with the responsibility and duty of the faithful execution of all the laws of the Federal Government, chosen by the expressed will of all the people, the personnel of the present incumbent being well known and trusted by everyone.

The war-cabinet bill authorizes the members of the cabinet to consider, devise, and formulate plans and policies for the conduct and prosecution of the war and procure the execution of the same. No similar provision is found in the Overman bill, because the Constitution vests these powers in the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

The war-cabinet bill empowers the members of the cabinet to supervise, coordinate, direct, and control the functions and agencies of the Government as in their judgment may be necessary or advisable for the conduct of the war, which is practically the same power proposed to be given the President in the Overman bill.

The war-cabinet bill authorizes the members of this council to consider and determine, subject to review by the President, all differences and questions relating to the conduct and prosecution of the war that may arise between the departments, officials, and agencies of the Government, to utilize the services of executive departments, officers, and agents of the United States, and even of the several States, and to issue orders to any such department, bureau, official, or agency of the Government necessary to enforce their decisions, which is far more comprehensive and drastic than the power given the President in regard to the same things in the Overman bill.

The war-cabinet bill, in section 3, requires the Secretaries of War and of the Navy to assign to duty with the war cabinet such commissioned officers as it may request, and authorizes the war cabinet to also employ all clerical and other employees required for its services—powers not given to the President in the Overman bill.

Mr. President, when the powers conferred in the Overman bill are reduced to the concrete it will be found that the President is merely authorized to coordinate and redistribute the functions and duties of the various executive departments, bureaus, commissions, and other agencies of the Government, and to transfer them and their officers and employees from and to departments, bureaus, commissions, and other agencies of the Government as he may deem best to promote expedition, economy, and efficiency, all of which and more is conferred upon the war cabinet in the bill providing for it.

Mr. President, those Senators who favored the war-cabinet bill, unless they wish to press it further, can not fail to support the Overman bill upon the ground that it confers too much power without being subject to the charge of inconsistency. The Overman bill confers less power and provides for fewer changes in the organization of the executive departments, bureaus, commissions, and other governmental agencies than the war-cabinet bill, and will afford relief from the conditions now existing.

Mr. President, the plan for a division of the control and direction of the conduct of the war as proposed in the war-cabinet bill is also unsound in policy. Combining the authority of a cabinet or commission with the Executive in control of armies divides the responsibilities, produces division of counsel, indecision, and almost invariably disaster. There is not found such a system in any well-organized government of the world, and for us to now change the policy which we have so long pursued would be a dangerous experiment and fraught with most disastrous consequences.

I believe that legislation of the character contained in the bill under consideration is necessary to authorize the President to coordinate and redistribute the functions of the executive department and administrative agents and agencies of the Government, and that it will aid materially in centralizing these powers into a single head, demonstrated by experience in all ages and in all countries to be necessary for the vigorous and successful prosecution of war.

I can do no better than quote from one of the greatest jurists this country has produced upon this subject. In Story on the Constitution, volume 2, section 1491, it is said:

> The command and application of the public force to execute the laws, to maintain peace, and to resist foreign invasion are powers so obviously of an executive nature and require the exercise of qualities so peculiarly adapted to this department that a well-organized government can scarcely exist when they are taken away from it. Of all the cases and concerns of the Government, the direction of war most peculiarly demands those qualities which distinguish the exercise of power by a single hand. Unity of plan, promptitude, activity, and decision are indispensable to success, and these can scarcely exist except when a single magistrate is intrusted exclusively with the power. Even the coupling of the authority of an executive council with him, in the exercise of such powers, enfeebles the system, divides the responsibility, and not infrequently defeats every energetic measure. Timidity, indecision, obstinacy, and pride of opinion must mingle in all such councils and infuse a torpor and sluggishness destructive of all military operations.

CONFIDENCE IN THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. President, there has been much said about the possibility of the abuse of the powers proposed to be conferred upon the President by the Overman bill. Woodrow Wilson needs no defense from Senators in this Chamber, and no eulogy of him or his public record as Chief Executive of the Nation is necessary. The people of the United States expressed their confidence in his integrity and ability when they called him to the greatest executive office not only in their gift but in the world, and, after four years' service, reaffirmed their confidence and approved his administration by reelecting him to a second term. I hardly need recall to Senators that during these four years more constructive legislation was enacted and more reforms successfully inaugurated than in any period of our national existence.

When we were compelled to enter this fearful war we are waging with Germany our people were contented, happy, and prosperous beyond all reasonable expectations. Our farmers and manufacturers were realizing higher prices for their products than before known; our laborers were earning the most remunerative wages of any in the world, and our domestic and foreign commerce had doubled and trebled and was increasing by great leaps and bounds.

President Wilson's administration of the affairs of the country during that period can not be successfully assailed and there are none who deny his patriotism and devotion to the interests of the people. He is recognized as one of the greatest Chief Executives that ever adorned the great office he so ably fills, and by his countrymen and all civilized peoples as one of the ablest statesmen and rulers of the world. If the personality of the present Chief Executive is to be decisive of the wisdom of the proposed legislation, there is no reason why it should not be enacted.

But, Mr. President, we should take a broader view of the question and be governed by a higher principle in determining the wisdom of conferring these great governmental powers and should ask ourselves whether we can trust the integrity, patriotism, and ability of the Chief Executive of the Nation, whoever he may be, for no man knows, in the uncertainty of human events, who may occupy that high office and administer the law. We must trust some one in all relations of life—social, business, political, and official—and there are comparatively few cases where confidence has been misplaced. God so constituted men that when they are called to positions of great power and responsibility they seldom fail to rise to the occasion and exercise those powers honestly and faithfully.

The powers proposed to be here conferred are large and vital to the interest of the public; they must vest somewhere and in some officer. Where, Mr. President, I ask, can they be placed with more confidence and with more safety to the interest of the people than in the hands of the President of the United States? Will we in this great crisis, when the freedom and happiness of our people, the perpetuity of our free institutions, the lives of our soldiers, and civilization itself are at stake and trembling in the balance, dependent upon the uncertain fortunes of war on the battle fields of France, say to the world that we are not willing to trust the integrity and ability of our Chief Executive?

Chief Justice Taney, in the great case of Luther versus Borden, which practically involved the form of government of the State of Rhode Island, concerning the act of Congress empowering the President to call out the militia of the States in cases of insurrection, said:

> "It is said that this power in the President is dangerous to liberty and may be abused. All power may be abused if placed in unworthy hands. But it would be difficult, we think, to point out any other hands in which this power would be more safe and at the same time equally effectual. * * * And the elevated office of the President, chosen as he is by the people of the United States, and the high responsibility he could not fail to feel when acting in a case of so much moment, appear to furnish as strong safeguards against a willful abuse of power as human prudence and foresight could well provide."

Another great American, a profound student of history and political science and a constructive statesman, with no thought of the application I am making of it, wrote of the confidence and trust to be reposed in high officials as follows:

> "If there be one principle clearer than another, it is this: That in any business, whether of government or of mere merchandising, somebody must be trusted in order that when things go wrong it may be quite plain who should be punished. In order to drive trade at the speed and with the success you desire, you must confide without suspicion in your chief clerk, giving him power to ruin you, because you thereby furnish him with a motive for serving you. His reputation, his own honor or disgrace, all his own commercial prospects, hang upon your success. And human nature is much the same in government as in the dry-goods trade. Power and strict accountability for its use are the essential constituents of good government. A sense of highest responsibility, a dignifying and elevating sense of being trusted, together with a consciousness of being in an official station so conspicuous that no faithful discharge of duty can go unacknowledged and unrewarded, and no breach of trust undiscovered and unpunished—these are the influences, the only influences, which foster practical, energetic, and trustworthy statesmanship. The best rulers are always those to whom great power is intrusted in such a manner as to make them feel that they will surely be abundantly honored and recompensed for a just and patriotic use of it, and to make them know that nothing can shield them from full retribution for every abuse of it."

Mr. President, while I believe in constitutional government and strict observance of constitutional limitations, this is a time when we must liberally resolve all doubts concerning the validity of measures and legislation intended to strengthen the executive branch of our Government in the performance of the great, responsible, and solemn duties which it is called upon to discharge. I do not fear that the President of the United States will abuse the great powers proposed to be conferred by this bill. We are involved in the greatest war of all history, with the best prepared, most efficient, and powerful nation of the world, and we must use all our resources and devote all of our energies to bring it to a successful and victorious conclusion. There is no middle ground and no compromise—it is war to the knife and knife to the hilt; it is victory or subjugation. The indomitable spirit and unchangeable determination of the American people are aroused and fixed. We will fight to the end and we will conquer. There can be no safe and enduring peace but one made in Berlin and dictated by the President and the Congress of the United States.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the proposed committee amendment to insert the words "or administrative" after the word "executive" in line 23, page 2 of the bill, I desire to submit some rather general observations upon it.

As to how long this war will last, no one who cares for confidence in his judgment dares prophesy. Recent developments indicate a prolonged struggle. The fact that the conflict will be long drawn out is no reason for taking our own time in furnishing men, munitions, and transportation, the three prime factors in the achievement of success. Every means for hastening the work of getting ready these essential agencies consistent with reasonable thoroughness should be employed. Every diligence should be practiced in every sphere of preparation. Everything should be done by public officials and by private citizens "for the successful prosecution of the war." At the same time we should look ahead and plan for the future on the assumption that there will be no let up for years to come in the task before us, which calls for meeting force by force to the limit.

There is nothing in the history of our enemy that would encourage us to believe that after being driven back across the Rhine he would be inclined to sue for peace. The record of Germany is 30 years in one continuous war. The loss of 40 per cent of the population is none too great for those in power. The making of war has been the business of our enemy. It has not been without profit. Denmark will testify to that when reminded of Schleswig-Holstein. France knows it full well, and by daily symbol of mourning placed on the Strasburg monument she kept her people aware of it. Alsace-Loraine and a billion of gold were the profits of 1870 to her then and now unrelenting enemy. That enemy will be slow to acknowledge defeat. All the more necessity for making that defeat so complete that it will be impossible for that enemy who typifies the Iliad, with the Goddess of Discord brandishing torch and spear, to ever again jeopardize the peace of the world and imperil civilization.

It must be determined now whether selfishness and hate shall be the rule among nations or justice and good will. It must be settled whether the policy of aggression shall be recognized as the sound one or the policy of equality and self-development shall prevail among nations. It must be established once and for all whether a nation's greatness and strength shall hereafter depend upon its mobilizing the most terrible force and employing it in the most savage way or on intelligence, enlightenment, love of liberty, due regard for the rights of others, progress in science, art, and industry, and setting free every man to be his best and do his best. It is to be decided now and finally whether the world is to be dominated by an autocracy, under some pretense of Divine right, sustained by military power, or whether peoples may continue to have a voice in the Government under which they live and which they support, and which is to exist for the benefit of the people at large rather than for a chosen class—whether the people are to be vassals or freemen. In brief, the issue is whether might shall conquer and control right, and that question must be settled before this war can end. It will not be settled until it is settled right, and that, we may expect, will take time and call for supreme effort.

We take one side of these questions and we realize that the cost will be stupendous, but we have always known that the price of freedom is sacrifice. Not merely giving up surplus, but giving of energy, money, and resources to the extent of all we have, if need be, is the call. We realize the undertaking is a difficult one, and therefore we are reconciled to the difficulties. If we can remove any difficulty, that helps. If we can smooth the way by displacing a single obstacle and substituting an improvement, we render real service.

No matter what the cost, irrespective of the sacrifice, without regard to the time required, we are driven to match force by force to the bitter end, that our institutions, our national life, may be preserved and the world be assured that hereafter—

> Nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

If disaster follows disaster in this mighty enterprise to our arms, who will be held primarily responsible before the people of this country and before the world? Who will go down in history as having failed in the greatest war of all time in which was involved the welfare of the human race?

In case of conclusive victory, which we confidently expect and are determined to gain, who, with others associated with him in similar positions, will receive and deserve the confidence and commendation of mankind?

Plainly, the answer is, the President of the United States.

Since the responsibilities, therefore, rest on his shoulders, can there be any justification for withholding from him any power or any authority which may strengthen his arm, relieve his difficulties, or open his pathway? Why withhold from him any assistance that may be serviceable in meeting his unequaled responsibilities?

That assistance we can render, and I am sure we ought to do all we can in that direction.

I am therefore in favor of the speedy passage of this measure.

It is plain, not ambiguous or lengthy, and will accomplish these results:

First. It will enable the President to proceed at once to the very heart of the matter in hand and conclude it without any circumlocution.

Second. It will make it possible for him to make the direct and best use of all material at hand.

Third. It will facilitate the elimination of delay, duplication, and lost motion.

Fourth. It will give undoubted authority to use each and all the departments, bureaus, commissions, created by law, and all officers in the most advantageous and effective way for the successful prosecution of the war.

Fifth. If a thing should be done by the process provided in this bill to count in winning the war, he can proceed to do it on the instant, without stopping to investigate whether some statute does not project across his pathway.

Sixth. It centralizes authority where chief responsibility rests, which in war times is essential.

Objection has been raised, not, I am moved to believe, because of any lack of confidence in the President, but rather in apprehension that the authority granted may be delegated, will have to be delegated by reason of the multitudinous demands on the President, and thereby duties may be assigned to some incompetent or unfaithful hands.

It is contended by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], for instance, that—

> The extreme authority in the bill is to take every function of the Government, save the legislative branch and the judicial branch, and to consolidate all powers, all duties, all responsibilities, in one man, unknown, unnamed, without the consent of the Senate.

This construction is most extraordinary. The express language of the bill is, "the President is hereby authorized" to do the things set forth.

It can not be said that the President is either "unnamed" or "unknown." All the authority expressed or implied in the bill is given directly and solely to the President. He is to utilize the existing agencies. He is not empowered to create a single new agency.

The authority covered by the bill is centered solely in the President, who is named and who is known.

Arguments have been made here by members of the Committee on Military Affairs, beginning with its distinguished chairman [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and including the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], in favor of coordinating and consolidating authority. They favored a single director of munitions and a war council of "three distinguished citizens of demonstrated ability."

We know of one possessing these qualifications in full measure. The people of the whole country have twice so declared. We might miss it as to the other two. We appeal for vesting that authority in that one—the President of the United States. This bill will accomplish that. If it is to be opposed, let it be done frankly on that ground.

In the meantime let it be remembered that we are just pulling ourselves together to play our part in the mighty struggle, just moving into action, while anxious eyes the world over are looking to us, and while Danubes of blood are being poured out in Europe, the air resounds with the roar of guns and the earth shakes "under the swiftly passing feet of men."

Mr. President, I raise no objection to criticism when it is intended to be constructive and helpful.

Criticism just for the sake of finding fault, just because it can be sustained in whole or in part, just for the reason that grounds for it exist, will not help us and is inexcusable. The effect of that sort of criticism is to discourage and demoralize. It is destructive criticism and ought to cease.

Pointing out blunders in order that they may be cured, calling attention to mistakes and shortcomings in order that they may be corrected, I make no complaint against, since, stated in good faith, that may lead to stimulating diligence and bring about changes which would result in more efficient service.

But the changes or reforms recommended I do not, in some instances, believe would result in the benefits their advocates suppose. That there have been some mistakes made in almost every department of the Government during the past year in the solution of the new problems which confronted us, under the most terrific pressure and with the untested means at hand, we may freely admit.

We may fairly claim, however, that such mistakes were comparatively negligible in quantity and in seriousness of consequences. We can fairly assert that where they were serious they were corrected, and none of them have been repeated.

I do not expect that we can hope to avoid completely mistakes in the future. We are not infallible; we can not achieve the impossible.

Every country, including "efficient" Germany, has made many mistakes. They continue to make them. They learn by experience—and we have been able to profit by their experience. The Government cabinets of England have changed twice, radically, and just avoided others. Those of France, four times; Italy, several times. They had labor troubles, too, and suffered from "profiteering" as well.

There has been no occasion for a single Cabinet change here. There are united, earnest, capable heads of departments in cordial cooperation with the President, without a break, and a Congress which has ever been ready to do its patriotic part.

We may differ among ourselves as to how best to do that part, but whatever conclusion is reached it becomes the conclusion of all.

I do not agree with some of my brother members on the Military Affairs Committee that there is or has been the need of successful business men, captains of industry, to have charge of the Ordnance Department, or, in fact, any section, bureau, or division of the War Department.

I make no reflection on business men. Many of them have been of great assistance in mobilizing the industries of the country. Others have hindered and hurt.

This getting ready for a war on a gigantic scale and conducting that war is not a business man's job. This is the people's war and the soldier's fight.

It is the trained soldier's work to get ready to fight as well as actually engage in the battles.

Our need was in the outset for soldiers in command—not business men. When a country's business becomes that of waging war, the soldiers must take charge.

The business man's training and experience have been along different lines. He is accustomed, in a manufacturing enterprise, for illustration, to consider, first, what amount of capital is invested; second, what are to be the overhead expenses; third, what is the output to be and its value; fourth, what can be reasonably expected as profit.

I do not agree with the criticism that West Point makes a good soldier but a poor business man. In the sense that "business" plays any part in the work of preparation for war, the West Point soldier is fully equipped. He does not have to trouble with profits—there is to be none. He need not consider overhead expenses as against requirements; he must not delay while entering into refined calculations as to expense.

He knows that no fixed amount in dollars and cents is involved—something vastly more important than that must be considered.

The soldier lays all these "business" items to one side. He risks all—fortune, reputation, life—to win.

Like the Stoic of old, he does not jubilate, he does not whine—he fights. The battle begins with him when the war is declared. He knows what he wants—leave it to him and he will get it. He knows how to use it when it is ready.

In my judgment, the criticisms would more justly lie against calling in too many "business men" and giving them too much latitude to interfere after the flag was raised and the sword unsheathed.

It then became a military matter, and trained military men should have been left free to plan, direct, and manage the assembling, equipment, and training of the military forces, under the supreme command of the President and his aids, the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, both having demonstrated preeminent abilities.

The report respecting the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps, submitted recently to the Senate, supports this view and condemns, in effect, the idea of civil control of important branches of the military operations. Here was a splendid illustration of the folly of placing civilians in practical control of the air service. I did not favor either the majority or the minority report, although both together may be held to fairly give the facts, allowing conclusions to take care of themselves.

The facts condemn civil or "business men's" control of that service which experience abroad has shown to be highly important.

The chairman of the Aircraft Board and civilian associate members have been in control of recommendations for production; and there is where humiliating disappointment has resulted. The training operations under military control have been all that could be asked.

Your "captains of industry," your successful "business men," have failed in that unforgiving delays have resulted from their conduct of affairs. No finer body of courageous and fit young men can be found than those enlisted in that service; and all they need are the machines which will enable them to "fight out the issue of right and wrong far beyond our vision."

They are ready to join what Mr. Lloyd-George describes as the "cavalry of the clouds." They are worthy to be classed as the "knighthood of this war"; they are fit to constitute the "chivalry of the air," whose "every flight shall be a romance and every report an epic."

Your civilian control makes them wait. It is claimed, I know, that the Aircraft Board has no power other than advisory. I do not so read the act of October 1, 1917. It is possible that some confusion of services, some overlapping of authority, some lack of more definite modification of the act of July 24, 1917, gave trouble in operation under the two acts.

There is need for exercise of just such powers in this connection as the pending measure contemplates. Civilians in direct charge of the work of production and a separation of production from operation—and both from the work of engineers and designers—all under one general head, would doubtless greatly improve the aircraft situation. Liberty motors have been tested in France as well as here, and are found to do all that has been claimed for them. They are coming out in satisfactory quantities. Raw materials should go forward to the factories of England and France as well as be supplied to our own factories. Our motors should be shipped abroad as well as used at home. Production will shortly meet the demands. There have been most unfortunate delays, and the causes therefor should be removed and a recurrence avoided. It must be remembered that the industry is new and those connected with it have had less than one year's experience, except that Gen. Squier has been a student of the subject and has had practical experience extending over some years. A very great deal has been accomplished, it is but fair to state.

With other branches of the service we should be fair, when disposed to criticize, by calling to mind the tremendous and important achievements to their credit.

Take the Army. Much of the criticism is about as reasonable as the Irishman's comment that the British Army was being ruined by taking in so many civilians. No country ever treated its soldiers better at any time than has the United States as directed by the Secretary of War. At the camps and cantonments the officers and men have been provided with excellent food, good accommodations, the most modern laundries, refrigerators, cooking utensils, light, fuel, recreation facilities, reading rooms, athletic field, entertainment, and the very best influences for the promotion of their physical, mental, and spiritual welfare.

The camps and cantonments have been arranged in accordance with scientific sanitary requirements and have been extraordinarily healthy and wholesome.

The details of the "First year of America's participation, reviewed by department officials," will be found in the Official Bulletin of April 8, beginning with page 9 and ending with page 16.

Just for illustration and as examples of such proof I am tempted to quote from a letter, sent to me by a valued correspondent in Chicago, from a soldier "in active service with the American Expeditionary Forces" in France to his home folks. He says:

You will note that I am somewhere in France. This is not as definite as it might be, but inasmuch as I have to be in France anyway, it doesn't make a great deal of difference just where I am. There is nothing much to be said about the Army, except that we are remarkably well treated—so much better than I ever imagined that I am agreeably surprised. The food is excellent, and our officers are continually looking out for our welfare, not only physically but morally. There are going to be a good many more real men made in the Army and by the Army than have ever been made by one institution before, and if a good percentage of us come back you are going to see a changed code for young men, I really believe. Another thing, coming down from more or less fancy salaries to the Army pay has a tendency to teach one the value of a dollar in a way peculiarly impressive.

Am enjoying the best of health, and considering that I am about 5,000 miles away from everyone who is near and dear to me, might be considered contented. Some day the Kaiser is going to get his, and we are going to help do it; and then I hope it is written that I may return to my own, perhaps a little older—but I'm still pretty young, at that—doubtless a little wiser, but surely more appreciative of the things with which we are blessed in our own land, and perhaps a little proud if I may have helped to preserve that which we now realize is so dear to us—our liberty.

Also one from a Florida boy to his father from a training camp last March:

DEAR FATHER: Please excuse me for not writing sooner, but, as you know, moving is no small job. We arrived here Monday, and everything is very nice. Wednesday I was given a pass and called on Cousin Tommy. He took me out to supper, but as I had to be back in camp at 11, we could not take in a show or anything else.

Our section of the division is now doubly anxious to get "over there" since the sinking of the Tuscania, and our boys will surely avenge the cowardly murder of our comrades. When we leave no one knows, as orders come when we least expect them, but we are always ready; our training is perfect.

I had the pleasure of stretching my limbs on Florida soil, and I am sure I could have walked home if I could have obtained permission to go. Gee, being so close to home and my dear ones and not able to see them certainly gave me the blues until our train got out of Florida.

I am glad you, mother and Ide don't write any doleful letters like some of our boys get; it does no good. What the boys like to receive from home are cheerful letters, letters that tell them that all is well at home, etc.

This may be my last letter until I get "over there." Remember me to all my friends and give them my best wishes. Tell them we soldiers all like to receive letters, even "P. C.'s" are prized.

You want to let everybody know that Uncle Sam takes good care of his soldiers and none of us can find any cause for complaint—plenty to eat, good and warm clothing, and the best medical care in case of sickness.

Don't forget to tell everybody of the great and noble work of the Red Cross.

I am well and happy, and I hope this will find you and all in like condition. With best love, etc.

Your devoted son.

These letters are illustrative of conditions which may be said to be characteristic in the Army.

The expansion of the Army has been a huge undertaking, admirably executed.

Just a brief reference to the figures will show that in April 1917, there were in the Regular Army, 5,791 officers and 121,737 men. In April, 1918, there were 10,698 officers and 503,142 men.

The National Guard, April, 1917, had 3,733 officers and 76,713 men, and in April, 1918, 10,893 officers and 431,503 men.

The Reserve Corps—in service—in April, 1917, had no officers and 4,000 men; in April, 1918, there were 96,210 officers and 77,360 men.

The National Army had no officers or men in April, 1917, and in April, 1918, it had 516,839 men.

Total, April, 1917, 9,524 officers and 202,510 men, and in April, 1918, 123,801 officers and 1,528,924 men.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator is in possession of the information and it is proper to divulge it, can he tell me approximately how many men we have now in France?

Mr. FLETCHER. I could not attempt to be absolutely accurate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the question for the reason that I have been asked to-day by a letter from a valued constituent to give that information if obtainable. I have not applied to the War Department. As the Senator was discussing the matter I did not know but that he or the chairman of the committee might possibly be able to give me approximately the number.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would be very glad to give it to the Senator, but I could not do it with absolute accuracy; and even if I could I would hesitate to name the figure.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought likely there might be an objection to doing that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I would prefer that the chairman of the committee should make a statement on the subject.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can not answer the question definitely at this time, but I agree with the Senator from Florida. I question the propriety of answering it just at this moment. I will say, however, that in discussing the matter with the Secretary of War a few days ago he said, "I know you will be agreeably surprised at the rapidity with which we are getting men to France." I am sure he would advise the Senator confidentially just what the status is.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it would be more satisfactory for the Senator to get the information direct from the Secretary of War.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree that that would be the proper procedure.

Mr. FLETCHER. Referring now to what I was saying, the first thing to be done was to get the men; the second was to provide for munitions, and then transportation.

I will not go through the various activities which are set forth in the Official Bulletin mentioned; and a most interesting and creditable showing is there made.

The absence of scandals, which make their appearance in all wars, big or little, is marked.

The mobilization of the military and naval forces within a year has been wonderfully successful.

The personnel of the Navy has grown from 4,792 officers to 20,664, and from 77,946 men to 329,333.

The increase in the Army has been 700 per cent, and in the Navy 400 per cent.

We have safely landed in France, beginning July 3, 1917, 88 days after war was declared, an American Army exceeding in strength greatly that which existed when we entered the war. Actually engaged on the front are more American soldiers than we had a year ago. That Army is fully equipped and has supplies sufficient to sustain it for six months of fighting.

The Medical Corps has increased its personnel from 8,000 to 106,000; officers from 900 to 18,000; Army nurses (women) from 375 to 7,000; ambulance service (in training) from nothing to 6,000; hospitals have been constructed and equipped; behind the lines in France the Medical Service has constructed hospitals for 200,000 sick and wounded.

The Marine Corps has grown from 426 officers and 13,266 enlisted men to 1,389 officers and 38,629 men.

Every department of the Government was confronted with new problems and new duties requiring enormous expansion of force and vast responsibilities. There has been a clear conception of these responsibilities and a spirit of patriotic fervor and absence of discord which ought to be reassuring in the highest degree.

There is no cause, so far as the administration of national affairs is concerned, for pessimism. Considering what is happening on the other side, we can not feel that there is reason for optimism. Our attitude should be one of consecration and determination.

I desire to insert in the RECORD an editorial from the Florida Times-Union of April 6, entitled "New conditions of the war," as a part of my remarks and at the close thereof without reading; also an editorial from the Christian Science Monitor of April 1, entitled "The lesson of the iron ramrods," with the same request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). It is so ordered, without objection.

GERMAN EFFICIENCY.

Mr. FLETCHER. Sometimes we hear comparisons drawn between the efficiency of government under a democracy and that of a military autocracy, to the disparagement of the former.

Taking Germany as typical of the latter, let us get a glimpse of what it means.

In 1912 the greater portion of the farm work in Germany was done by women. A woman farm laborer was paid from 38 to 48 cents a day. Children over 12 years of age earned 24 cents a day. Male farm laborers were paid 72 cents a day. Engineers and conductors on State railroads were paid 70 cents a day. The State paid skilled railway shop workers about $1 a day.

Gustavus A. Myers characterized the German industrial system as marked by these characteristics:

Oppression of the farmers, underpaid labor, industrial enslavement of women and children, shocking housing conditions, growing pauperism,

This was the price the German people paid for militarism, and it was against these that they revolted in 1848. Prussia put down that revolt when it threatened the old conditions, and thus Prussia made herself acceptable as the leading State of the Empire instead of Austria. As a result, a great emigration began led by Carl Schurz.

Here we have an indication as to the cost the people of Germany have paid for the military efficiency of which they boast. We can understand when the bottom stratum bears so large a proportion of the burden what opportunity is given to the surface for a display which so long deceived the world. How would the American people like the German system as an economic foundation for an American structure?

Mirabeau said 125 years ago:

War is the national industry of Prussia.

Later Napoleon said that Prussia "was hatched from a cannon ball."

The French military attaché, shortly before the Franco-Prussian War of 1870, wrote:

Other countries possessed an army, but in Prussia the army possessed the country.

Waging war has been the chief industry of Germany. The people have been made to believe it paid. The policy of aggression has been maintained, and in 1914 undoubtedly the plan was to acquire new territory and unlimited treasure.

Former Ambassador Gerard tells us in his book, My Four Years in Germany, page 76, that there have been many instances in Germany where officers having a slight dispute with civilians have instantly cut the civilian down. Witness the so-called Zabern affair.

Lieut. von Forstner had an altercation with a lame shoemaker and cut him down. He was tried by court-martial for striking and wounding an unarmed civilian and sentenced by the lower court to one year's imprisonment, but was acquitted by the higher court as having acted in "supposed self-defense" (p. 86).

The matter was a subject of debate in the Reichstag December 4, 5, and 6, 1913. The war minister in a bitter speech before the Reichstag justified and defended the lieutenant, who was only 20 years of age.

This Zabern affair and the consequent attitude of the whole nation, as well as the extraordinary vote in the Reichstag, greatly alarmed the military party. It was perhaps the final factor which decided the advocates of the old military system of Germany in favor of a European war.

The Social Democrats remained in their seats and refused to rise and cheer the Emperor when the Reichstag adjourned. It seems they have that custom in Germany, and that the Social Democrats had previous to that time retired from the Chamber, but on this occasion, notwithstanding they remained in their seats, they refused to cheer the Emperor.

Mr. Gerard says (p. 91):

This occurrence I know greatly incensed the Emperor and did much, I believe, to win his consent to the war.

This system results in raising up murderers of innocent women and children, breakers of solemn treaties, bombers of occupied hospitals and churches, and a monster capable of planting his tyrannical heel in the face of fair Belgium.

Against that sort of savagery, against that kind of brutal disregard of every civilized impulse, against that inhuman machine, we are forced to contend with all our might.

The people of the United States have given us the leader in that vital undertaking. He is the people's chosen commander of the land and naval forces of the country, and they trust him and they will follow him. Will Congress do less?

Will the Senate deny to him full and unquestioned authority to make the best possible use of the agencies created by law and the resources at hand "for the successful prosecution of the war?"

I hope and believe you will not.

Let us come to a decision on the measure. Delay is dangerous. Senators are unstinted in their criticism of delays holding up the work in various governmental activities, overlooking the fact that they appear to take their own time when it comes to enacting needed legislation.

For days bills reported by committees as urgent have been debated and opposed, as if Senators were perfectly willing to sacrifice liberty in re for liberty in verbis.

The Constitution is invoked as if the country was made for the Constitution rather than the Constitution for the country.

The "all highest war lord" is not halting or hesitating in his operations.

The experiences at Saloniki, Gallipoli, and in Mesopotamia must not be repeated, and the tragic cry, "Too late," must not go up in France!

There can be no justification for marking time or killing time here when guns and gas bombs and bayonets are settling the world's future on the battle lines.

It is claimed by some that the President has all the power given by this bill under his constitutional prerogatives.

Mr. President, I do not understand that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] observed that it is claimed that the President has the power under some statute, but it is claimed that he has such power under his constitutional prerogative. If so, why object to repeating the authority and having it specifically delegated by Congress instead of asserted with some chance of contest? Except where statutes, regulations, or court interpretations stand in the way, the claim may be admitted. The trouble is there are such obstacles.

Quick decision and quick action are often important and situations arise when there is no time to examine statutes and regulations or to ask and secure their modification when found.

The President should have this delegation of the power to coordinate the executive and administrative agencies of the Government whenever and wherever he finds it advantageous for the uses of war on the instant.

Many existing executive and administrative processes of the Government are complicated and cumbersome. The necessary readjustments to meet war conditions can only be effectively obtained by a blanket authority to the President such as the bill provides.

It is contended that the bill creates an autocracy, but it is well said that "an autocracy is defined by the source, not by the extent, of power. No authority which is given and can be taken away by the people is autocratic."

There is full recognition of the power of Congress by the very proposals of this bill.

Congress has not hesitated to grant arbitrary power to executive departments. For instance, the power to issue fraud orders and deny citizens the use of the mails and the censorship given the Post Office Department. March 3, 1863, Congress passed an act (12 Stat., 775) which provided as follows:

That any order of the President or under his authority made at any time during the existence of the present rebellion shall be a defense in all courts to any action, civil or criminal, pending or to be commenced for any search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment made, done, or committed, or acts omitted to be done under and by virtue of such order or under color of any law of Congress, and such defense may be made by special plea or under the general issue.

The Supreme Court upheld this statute in the case of Mitchell v. Clark (110 U. S., 633).

Any order for "search, seizure, arrest, or imprisonment" would seem to be fully as comprehensive and drastic as any action that would be possible under the provisions of the pending bill.

The bill expressly provides the normal peace status of affairs shall be resumed at the close of the war.

It is strictly a war measure, and there ought to be no hesitation about its enactment. No authority heretofore given the President has been abused and it is absurd to assume that the authority here granted would be. We are warranted—indeed, obliged—to do things in abnormal times which would not be considered under ordinary conditions. No more argument is required to sustain this bill than is needed to sustain that proposition.

APPENDIX I.

[From the Florida Times-Union, Jacksonville, Fla., Saturday, Apr. 6, 1918.]

NEW CONDITIONS OF THE WAR.

After three years of a war whose issue will shape the destinies of humanity for many years of the future, the enemies of Germany now present a front which has changed in many respects from the one that had grown familiar. Heretofore Germany defended herself in a large degree by the mobility of her forces, and this was made possible by the fact that all her strength could be directed by one mind. If that mind be capable, it is always possible for such a body to present a superior or effective force at the vital point chosen for action. Mr. Lloyd-George says the attack now wearing itself out employed "overwhelming numbers" against the British trenches. This does not mean that Germany had a superiority in men or guns in France, but that she collected her strength at the point of contact while no such concentration had been accomplished by her enemies.

At last the enemies of Germany have now taken a like measure, and Gen. Foch can direct without hindrance the movements of 5,000,000 men to secure an effect proposed. This change in conditions implies a radical change in the plans of campaign. Concentration can now be met by concentration, or a proposed attack may be diverted by an attack in another quarter so strongly pushed as to compel an abandonment of the proposed action of the enemy; when the tactics of Ludendorff can be met by the tactics of Foch, it will be a meeting of two minds as well as two bodies.

Now, let us apply the lesson to our own country. The resources of the American people are boundless as the word is generally used, and their whole strength has been loyally devoted to this war; so was the strength of France and of England and of Italy and of Belgium. But we have seen how the greater strength of one body could be attacked alternately with more or less success by the weaker body whose forces were more easily handled, capable of swifter motion and quicker concentration. This activity of the German forces was possible because the organization had been carefully perfected by years of drill and the constant enforcement of rigid discipline for many years. It is the absence of such training that has made it impossible to collect all the force of Germany's enemies into one effective blow which, striking a vital organ, would paralyze the whole machinery of her life.

This inability to handle her power effectively on the spur of the moment forced France to abandon some of her most valuable Provinces to the enemy; it entailed the loss of England's expeditionary force, one of the finest armies ever sent to battle; even after a year's diligent preparation Italy felt the need of it in the successful raid of the enemy, which held a portion of the Lombary plain for a time. But these, our friends, could mobilize their strength faster than we for many reasons. In the first place, they had lived for years in the constant anticipation of such a need as now comes to them; their plans had gone much further than their preparedness, although their preparation had progressed far beyond ours.

Moreover, their strength was concentrated within a comparatively small area, thickly inhabited and served by a better developed and better planned system of highways. Their highways were built with an eye to military uses, while the projectors of our roads had no thought or comprehension of military needs. Upon a war basis their Governments reach individuals immediately; ours must pass to the citizen through an infinity of laws, political organizations, and popular opinions as to what might be desired or permitted.

Let us now consider results. Attacked at her heart, the first year of the war showed France still unprepared because she had not provided effectively against a strike of railroad employees whose refusal to perform their appointed duties would isolate her armies and starve them into retreat or surrender. Her Government was republican, like ours, but she was compelled to place all the employees of her public-service plants under military law; after this to proclaim a strike was to propose a mutiny, and the individual became in law a deserter from the ranks. One year after a foreign enemy struck boldly at the gates of her capital the strength of France was still unorganized.

Two years after she had declared she was fighting for her life England found her power of attack threatened with dissolution by the danger of a strike from the coal mines and the munition factories. It was the organization of the fighting forces of industry that made Lloyd-George the directing mind of his country. If England did not reach this stage until two years after she declared war, she can not claim that her progress has been faster than ours.

Italy began to mobilize her forces when the German armies crossed the frontiers of Belgium in August, 1914. Perhaps she did not decide for some months on which side she would fight, and certainly others were in doubt, but she knew she must fight and devoted all her energies to the work of preparing for taking part in the war. She had achieved her preparedness in great measure when she cast in her lot with the entente powers, but more than a year after reaching that decision the Bolosists nearly broke down her strength in the trenches and her troops were compelled to abandon positions won at great cost of blood and treasure because she regarded them as threatening to her national life while they remained in the hands of the enemy.

Can it be said that, with all their advantages of propinquity to the war and of a greater concentration of population and political powers, our allies have done more in a year than we have accomplished? In a like period they had not prepared adequately for their defense—we speak not of a military defense exclusively, but of all the forces that make defense effective—their credit was largely exhausted, their supplies of food and munitions had become inadequate. That this was true of the enemy nations also should not conceal from us the fact that it was equally applicable to our friends, who had every advantage they could derive from that command of the sea which had been supposed to exert a commanding influence on such a struggle. Even without the interposition of the submarine, the entente powers were in danger of defeat for lack of supplies which could not be secured from neutrals without the money or credit which was rapidly failing them because the financial burden must be carried in great part by one of them.

Now, what has the United States accomplished within a year? We who would be glad to find she has done the impossible need not be ashamed to declare the result in plain language. It is objected that our Army at the front is small, that our guns are few, and our air service in embryo—allowing the weight of these facts, what have we on the credit side of the ledger?

We have been in the war for a year. We found our friends asking for money, first of all; we have given it ungrudgingly, in full measure, and running over. The resources at the command of the enemies of the central Empires now embrace the wealth of the world subject only to the dangers of transportation across an ocean which a friend proposes to command, to protect, and to police. It was supposed that Britain would provide the navy and the shipping to make our aid effective.

We found our allies in immediate need of food and raw materials for the manufacture of munitions. In large measure we have provided these in unprecedented quantities for a year; from the lack of these defeat was imminent when we entered the war.

Britain, France, and Italy together have a force of 10,000,000 soldiers; unaided and alone we have a like number subject to call and nearly 2,000,000 already in the service or in preparation. Does it encourage Germany to know that when she has wiped from the face of the earth all the soldiers now in arms against her, she must meet an American Army of like numbers, as good in every sense, on the same ground? The soldier is the power that comes next after the provision of supplies that can alone make his bravery and skill effective; we have provided the money, the food, and the raw materials for this war, and we have the men in evidence.

Now, when we were asked for billions in money and millions of tons of provisions as the immediate necessities of our friends, we could not perform every service at the same moment. But the plans were then laid for the contracts under which we have secured the machinery for the production of shipping of aeroplanes; all this machinery was nonexistent when the demand for their use was made. The reports from the Departments of the War and Navy show notable progress; show the confident expectation that within another year we shall provide as much of all these as our three friends produce after their third year, we shall show our grand total with a whole year saved. Is this an achievement in which we can take no pride?

Let us recapitulate. Within a year we have organized the military resources of a population of 100,000,000 of people on a war basis—of a people trained only to peace—which had never been so organized before, since the demand made upon it during our Civil War was on a smaller scale, was immediately released and had been completely forgotten except as ancient history. To do this every existing industry must be put upon a new footing—our highways, our finances, our manufacturing industries, and our occupations must all be made over. The new demands were so heavy that every element of strength broke down under the strain as truly as these had broken down in England, France, and Italy, whose resistance met the original demands. Now we find that what they have done in three years we have done in one, because we have taken up their crushing burdens of money and food under which they were falling down so as to relieve their fighting strength of this incubus, and we are prepared, within a less time than they needed, to duplicate their production of men and fighting machinery.

Criticism that shows defects in the working of this vast machine may prove of service and is justified in so far as they are intended to correct faults, relieve undue strain at particular points, and show the possibility of even greater efficiency for the whole; but those who say America has done less than her duty in the common cause lack the vision which takes in the whole plan covered and must have failed to study the fruit already maturing to the harvest. It is for the American to take pride in his country instead of apologizing; it is for our friends to see what is behind America at war rather than to confine their consideration to the trench war only.

APPENDIX II.

[From the Christian Science Monitor.]

BOSTON, U. S. A., Monday, April 1, 1918.

THE LESSON OF THE IRON RAMRODS.

It is a regrettable fact that just at the present moment there should have sprung up in the United States a controversy, indeed, a heated controversy, over the war. Some controversy there has always been, a controversy which has at times threatened the national unity. But it has generally calmed down as those engaged in it have had time to think again, and have recognized the vital necessity of unity in the present crisis. No doubt there have been faults on both sides, but equally no doubt in any great war it is easy to criticize the party in power. Everybody knows that in spite of determined efforts to maintain harmony, dissatisfaction grew so violent at one time that a change of government took place in the United Kingdom, whilst there have been certain other individual resignations arising out of individual differences. In France, again, there has been a perfect succession of premiers, whilst in Italy also there has been change. It is not curious, then, that there should be considerable difference of opinion in the United States, but there is this excuse to be advanced for Mr. Wilson's government, which can scarcely be advanced for that of any other country, the excuse that the United States was not merely unprepared for war but that it did not possess any of the machinery by which wars are made.

It had not, that is to say, any great dockyards like the United Kingdom or any great arsenals like France and Italy. It was so unaccustomed to making munitions that when, as a neutral, its firms tendered to the allied Governments for munitions they found in numerous cases that they were unable to obtain the machinery to fulfill their contracts. Then, again, the American mercantile marine had been for half a century permitted to decay. Therefore when the demand for ships was made, not only was it necessary to increase the existing plants but it was absolutely necessary to build new plants and convert ordinary mechanics into shipwrights. These were difficulties that other countries had not experienced in at all the same degree, because other countries possessed numbers of trained mechanics, used to making munitions, and capable of quickly training others to increase the output. For this reason the Government of the United States was entitled to claim special consideration. But unfortunately what has taken place has been something more than an ordinary delay and has to be accounted for by some other means than a national inaptitude for specific work.

The old shipyards have not done badly. They have doubled their plants and set to work to turn out a considerable amount of shipping. This is largely true of the Great Lakes, for instance, where a considerable output is still locked up by frozen waterways. It is true in even a greater degree of certain large steel works. Nevertheless, on the whole, the Nation is distinctly disappointed with its own achievement and is asking how it is that a country which has done such marvelous feats of engineering and has been capable of such vast business organizations should be found so largely failing to justify its own reputation in so tremendous a crisis.

Now, curiously enough, the explanation largely is in the crisis. The people of the United States have lived so cut off from the world outside their own borders that when the war broke out they entirely failed to grasp not only what it meant but what it amounted to. It has taken the country years to begin to grasp something of the intricate political inerlacings which made the incidents of the month of July, in 1914, inevitable. But there was something else that the country failed to understand even more, and that was the tremendous forces which had been unchained and the colossal preparations which had been heaped up against what Germany has always described as "der tag." The ordinary citizen of the United States scarcely understood, in the faintest degree, what the British Navy meant or what the German Army really amounted to. He had hardly begun to comprehend, when the war seized upon his own country, what it means to build a fleet or to muster, equip, and train an army. And it is perfectly safe to say that he had not the faintest idea of the amount of munitions which could be expended in a single day's fighting. When, consequently, the war came he imagined that he could proceed largely in the leisurely method of the old days. But just as Frederick, or perhaps one should say old Dessauer, taught Austria the lesson of iron ramrods, and just as Napoleon taught Prussia the obsoleteness of the oblique formation, so the United States, in its turn, had to discover that it could not do in a year what it had taken the European nations centuries to acquire a mastery of.

That is the real secret of the failure of the United States, and it is not a failure to be altogether ashamed of. It would have been better no doubt if, when the cloud burst, the country had realized a little more quickly that it knew nothing of the game of war. Then there would have been no time wasted over trying to improve on mechanical masterpieces, like the 75-millimeter French gun or the Lee-Enfield rifle. After all, when a nation is at war, the great thing is to get into the war, and not to set to work to make experiment which, if they were going to made, should have been made before he war. The people of the United Kingdom, like the people of the United States, are rather proud than otherwise that they were not ready for the war, and they hold their unreadiness the greatest proof of their love of and desire for peace. But when the war broke on them they knew enough about fighting to know what war meant, and to be aware that in war time counts for more than most things. In the United States the Government officers imagined that they could settle down to perfecting aeroplane engines and quick firers with the same deliberateness as if they were plows and farm tractors. The United Kingdom and France, with their centuries of experience, knew otherwise.

Now, it is just here that the President's mistake developed. He showed, it is to be suspected, too much loyalty to his assistants. Everyone who knows the President knows one thing, that he gives his confidence slowly but that when he has given it, it is hard to destroy it. Loyalty is a magnificent quality, but there are moments in the history of nations when even loyalty may be strained too far. And some of the warmest of Mr. Wilson's supporters labor under the impression that in more than one instance his loyalty to his supporters has passed the bounds of wisdom. It is a peculiarly difficult thing to fathom the rights and wrongs of any complicated case, and this does not become less difficult when party feeling has entered into the discussion of it. But, brushing aside the details and the innumerable specific instances of failure which have been so largely in evidence in the debates of Congress, the fact remains that the output of the country has not been equal to what it should have been. It is, of course, equally true that swapping horses in crossing a stream is undesirable, and that even when the swapping is effected without disaster the new horse often does not exhibit a greater pace than the old one. Nevertheless, there are certain offices in the United States held to-day by gentlemen whose removal would not exactly destroy the confidence of the Nation in the President's ability to see the war through.

Mr. SHERMAN addressed the Senate. After having spoken for three-quarters of an hour,

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator would prefer to finish in the morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I can finish in the morning, and very expeditiously, too.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator prefers that course, I will move an executive session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I prefer it, if it is agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 8 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PUNISHMENT OF SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. OVERMAN. I submit a conference report on House bill 8753, known as the bill to amend section 3, title 1, of the espionage act, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report will lie on the table and be printed.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8753) to amend section 3, title 1, of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 6.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 3, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "or attempt to obstruct"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully utter, print, write, or publish any disloyal, profane, scurrilous, or abusive language about the form of government of the United States, or the Constitution of the United States, or the military or naval forces of the United States, or the flag of the United States, or the uniform of the Army or Navy of the United States, or any language intended to bring the form of government of the United States, or the Constitution of the United States, or the military or naval forces of the United States, or the flag of the United States, or the uniform of the Army or Navy of the United States into contempt, scorn, contumely, or disrepute, or shall willfully utter, print, write, or publish any language intended to incite, provoke, or encourage resistance to the United States, or to promote the cause of its enemies, or shall willfully display the flag of any foreign enemy, or shall willfully by utterance, writing, printing, publication, or language spoken, urge, incite, or advocate any curtailment of production in this country of any thing or things, product or products, necessary or essential to the prosecution of the war in which the United States may be engaged, with intent by such curtailment to cripple or hinder the United States in the prosecution of the war, and whoever shall willfully advocate, teach, defend, or suggest the doing of any of the acts or things in this section enumerated, and whoever shall by word or act support or favor the cause of any country with which the United States is at war or by word or act oppose the cause of the United States therein"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Provided, That any employee or official of the United States Government who commits any disloyal act or utters any unpatriotic or disloyal language, or who in an abusive and violent manner criticizes the Army or Navy or the flag of the United States shall be at once dismissed from the service. Any such employee shall be dismissed by the head of the department in which the employee may be engaged, and any such official shall be dismissed by the authority having power to appoint a successor to the dismissed official"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That section 1 of Title XII and all other provisions of the act entitled 'An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved June 15, 1917, which apply to section 3 of Title I thereof shall apply with equal force and effect to said section 3 as amended.

"That Title XII of the said act of June 15, 1917, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following section:

"'SEC. 4. When the United States is at war the Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person or concern is using the mails in violation of any of the provisions of this act, instruct the postmaster at any post office at which mail is received addressed to such person or concern to return to the postmaster at the office at which they were originally mailed all letters or other matter so addressed, with the words "Mail to this address undeliverable under espionage act" plainly written or stamped upon the outside thereof, and all such letters or other matter so returned to such postmasters shall be by them returned to the senders thereof under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the title, and agree to the same.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 22, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, on earth, and in the hearts of men, we approach Thee with profound gratitude for life, liberty, truth, justice, mercy, and all that makes life dear.

Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty; a lesson which we are learning anew in the world's present crisis. Help us to realize that eternal vigilance is not only the price of liberty, but it is the price of all that makes for righteousness in the soul.

Make us, therefore, we beseech Thee, zealous in all good works, that we may be strong to resist evil and to defend our rights against all intruders; and bring us in Thine own good time unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ, and we will ascribe all praise to Thee, in His Name. Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On April 19, 1918:

S. 3980. An act to prevent interference with the use of homing pigeons by the United States, to provide a penalty for such interference, and for other purposes.

On April 20, 1918:

S. 383. An act to punish the willful injury or destruction of war material or of war premises or utilities used in connection with war material, and for other purposes;

H. R. 9163. An act to provide for reimbursement of actual expenses or flat per diem for enlisted men traveling on duty under competent orders; and

H. R. 9902. An act to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District legislation which is on the Union Calendar.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, pending that I would like to ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Attorney General of the United States on the subject of this bill to try everybody by a military court.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting a communication. Is there objection?

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. McARTHUR. To reserve the right to object, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether there will be any agreement as to time for discussion to-day?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio had the floor and he asked unanimous consent to insert a communication from the Attorney General. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, pending the motion which I just made I would like very much to come to some agreement as to general debate. It has been some time since we have had a District day and we have some little bills here which we ought to pass and should pass without much discussion unless we get into what might be called strictly a talkfest. There has been something said about the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] wanting 45 minutes. I would not object to agreeing that Mr. TILSON have 45 minutes providing we can agree on a short time for general debate.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. CARY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he could suggest about how much time would be necessary?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I would suggest not exceeding an hour and a quarter. That would give the gentleman from Connecticut 45 minutes and would give half an hour for general debate, and the bills I think can be discussed amply under the five-minute rule.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What are the bills?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There are several little bills and, I might say for the information of the House, there are some minor bills which ought to be passed before we reach the more serious one. There are two bills on the calendar coming from the District Committee which will provoke much discussion, and they are the telephone bill and the bill for municipal ownership of street railways. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILLIARD] has charge of the telephone bill, and I am informed by him that he is not quite ready to take it up to-day, and I have no disposition to call up the street-railroad bill until we can have more time for it than we can give to-day, and I would say to the House those two bills which will make trouble, or at least provoke discussion, will not be called up to-day.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky which two bills he is going to call up?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have seven here. One is known as the patrol drivers' bill, another is concerning the collection of garbage, another about the purchase of supplies by Government employees, and another changing the law relative to the establishment of the probate court, which is the creation of stenographers' places. One is to regulate the hours of the fire department, known as the double-platoon bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I make an inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman advise the House whether or not it is likely that the so-called rent-profiteering bill will be returned to the House in one form or another at an early date or a relatively early date?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no information except what I see in the newspapers, which I do not regard generally as very reliable.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I congratulate the gentleman on his perspicacity. I have been very much in hopes, and I think the Members of the House have been in hopes, that that bill may become a law before the 30th of June. I may say, if I may be permitted, without any voluntary investigation on my part many facts have come to my attention, and doubtless to the attention of the other Members of the House, in the last 60 days in regard to the strained situation in the District of Columbia, and it is not unlikely when Congress convenes on December 1, unless this Congress takes appropriate action by legislation, the membership of this body and the Senate will find no place in which to live. That seems like a strong statement, but——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The landlords of the District seem to be more than hopeful that the Senate will not pass a bill with teeth in it. I do not share that with them, and I shall not believe such will be the case until the Senate actually passes a bill which will not meet the situation.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If I may be permitted to make one further statement in this same connection, a great many officers have been brought here on duty, who must come under the mandate of the Commander in Chief, of their superior officer, and are likely to be put in a still more serious condition that will greatly handicap this Government in carrying out its military work. I consider that any bill which the District Committee brings in or considers is worthy of attention, of course, and of early attention if possible; but nothing should be allowed to intervene to the extent of preventing early action on the profiteering bill, that will have all the teeth in it that anybody can desire, and then some.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WALSH. To ask the gentleman from Kentucky to yield. Is it his intention to call up as many bills as he can get considered to-day on the Union Calendar relating to the District of Columbia and restrict general debate on all the measures to half an hour in addition to the 45 minutes?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I desire that.

Mr. WALSH. And permit liberal debate on the measures?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Under the five-minute rule?

Mr. WALSH. Under the five-minute rule. Does the gentleman intend to restrict debate under the five-minute rule to the bills pending at the time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; I would be anxious to do that.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman might be anxious to do that——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And I would say to the gentleman that I would do the other most reluctantly.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that an hour and a half will be sufficient, from my information, on the first proposition and that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] be allowed one-half of the time in which to address the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is all right, Mr. Speaker; I will not object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] will state his request.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District bills which are on the Union Calendar, and that general debate be limited to an hour and a half, and that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] have 45 minutes of that time, and that the remainder of the time be divided between myself and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY].

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HILLIARD. To ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] to yield to me two minutes. I simply want to emphasize what the chairman of the committee has said, that there is an important measure, known as the telephone bill, looking to the governmental operation of the telephone system in the District of Columbia, to be considered by the House soon. It has been reported favorably by our committee. The chairman of the committee has assured me that we may have the next District day in which to consider that matter. It has been voluminously reported on in Report No. 379, Parts I and II. If the Members are sufficiently interested to look at those reports, they will find much useful information. In Part II of the report there is an exhaustive study which was made by the engineers of the Bureau of Standards. The situation is fully set forth there and explained in correspondence by the Postmaster General and others.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does any of this legislation coming up to-day have anything to do with the prosecution of the war?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. None whatever. I believe, however, I will qualify that by the statement that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] may make.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention, with the consent of the gentleman, to a bill which has passed the Senate and which has been asked by the Surgeon General, giving them the right to extend, during the period of war, a spur track into the medical distributing depot and for which they asked some time ago. The Senate has passed the bill, and the committee recommends that the bill be passed with an amendment which limits the time of the use of this track to 30 days after the declaration of peace. It is an emergency matter, because it is costing the Government hundreds of dollars a day and, more than that, it interferes, under the present plan, with a distribution of medical supplies. They are all shipped into this large depot and distributed to the different hospitals. I had hoped that the chairman would make that his first bill, because it is a war measure, recommended by the Surgeon General, who appeared before the committee. It has passed the Senate and has been recommended by the House committee unanimously.

Mr. EMERSON. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] intend to bring that measure up?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is my purpose to bring it up, or at least give the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] an opportunity to get it up, but I did not contemplate bringing it up to-day. I wanted to get out of the way some bills to which I thought there would be no objection.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am in receipt of many postals with the following heading, "For God's sake, hurry up!" I expect the other Members of this House are in receipt of many of these postals. The great Committee on Naval Affairs, with the aid of the Members of this House, gave an example of hurrying up by passing the naval appropriation bill in two days. I think that committee deserves much credit for hurrying up. Now, if the other committees having important war legislation will follow the example set by the Naval Affairs Committee, this Congress can not be criticized for not doing its duty. It is our patriotic duty to expedite legislation as much as possible, especially war legislation. We have thousands of our brave boys in France, and we will have thousands more there before the summer is over, and it is our duty to stand right back of them and not waste our time here in talking. I hope the different committees of this House will heed the warning on the postal, "For God's sake, hurry up!"

And while I am not going to object at this time, I shall object in the future to anything but war legislation.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, in order to facilitate matters, suppose we have the regular order.

ALASKAN ENGINEERING COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered printed, and referred to the Committee on the Territories:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the report of the Alaskan Engineering Commission for the year ended December 31, 1917.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 22, 1918.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. WALSH rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WALSH. I desire to make the point of order on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], that it is not in order for him to make the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole to consider District bills on the Union Calendar; that he must specify the measure which he desires to consider in the Committee of the Whole; that that motion would apply to bills on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion was to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider such bills as are on the Union Calendar reported from that committee.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and I make the point of order that that motion is not in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the customary motion.

The SPEAKER. That has been the practice ever since I have been here. The Chair will answer the gentleman further. The gentleman from Kentucky did state what bills he wanted to consider.

Mr. WALSH. A further parliamentary inquiry, pending the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Will it be in order for the Committee of the Whole to consider the bills which the chairman of the District Committee should call up in order without the committee rising and reporting each bill as it is completed?

The SPEAKER. That is exactly the reason for the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the customary procedure.

The SPEAKER. The committee itself disposes of one bill and lays it aside. Then the gentleman calls up another bill under this, and then the committee considers that and lays that aside, and when they get through with the whole batch——

Mr. WALSH. I submit that that is contrary to the rules.

The SPEAKER. That is in accordance with the practice of the House. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider such bills as are on the Union Calendar reported from the District Committee, and pending that motion he asks that the general debate be limited to an hour and a half; that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] shall have 45 minutes of it, and the other 45 minutes shall be equally divided between himself and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY]. Is there objection to that request?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar relating to the District of Columbia, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Union Calendar relating to the District of Columbia. Which bill does the gentleman from Kentucky wish to call up?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, under the arrangement I now yield the first 45 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

The CHAIRMAN. Should not the gentleman from Kentucky first call up some bill before the committee goes into general debate?

PURCHASE OF SUPPLIES FROM ARMY AND NAVY COMMISSARIES.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I call up the bill H. R. 10894.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10894) permitting certain persons to purchase supplies from the commissary stores of the Army and Navy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, under the arrangement entered into I now yield 45 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is recognized for 45 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the Members of the House for their very generous grant of this time in which to present some facts and some exhibits in connection with our gas-defense service. It is a most appropriate day for such a presentation, it being the third anniversary of that day of the Battle of Ypres in which gas was first used in the present war.

Prior to April 22, 1915, it was necessary to go at least as far back as the middle of the fourteenth century to find instances of the use of noxious gases in warfare. The Spartans used something of the kind against the Athenians in the wars between these two cities somewhere between 431 and 404 B. C. The method of using it was to saturate wood with pitch and sulphur and burn it under the walls of the defenders. Sometimes the fumes were blown over the lines of the enemy by means of huge bellows.

The Byzantine Greeks under Constantine Pogonatus, about the year 673 A. D., used against the Saracens what is known in military history as "Greek fire." For 400 years the secret of producing this substance is said to have been preserved in Constantinople as the palladium of that city's liberty. There must have been something wrong with the Saracen spy system. Finally the secret became known to the Saracens, who in their turn used it against the Christians during the Crusades, until the discovery of gunpowder made it obsolete. For centuries, however, the use of such means in war had fallen into disrepute among so-called civilized nations.

The first Hague conference pronounced against the use of such means, and Germany acceded to it.

On April 22, 1915, opposite the Ypres salient, near where the heaviest fighting has been going on for the last two weeks, the Germans liberated great clouds of chlorine gas, which by a favorable wind was carried over the British lines, causing most horrible casualties and considerable consternation. Being much heavier than air, it went down into the trenches and dugouts and was difficult of removal.

Crude means of combating the deadly effects of the gas were soon improvised, and before very long each soldier in the front-line trenches was supplied with some sort of a gas mask.

The next stage of gas offense saw shells filled with the deadly stuff and projected from guns and mortars far back of the front line of trenches, making it necessary for all as far back as the artillery positions to be protected by gas masks.

The mad race between the offensive and defensive in the use of noxious gases has kept up incessantly, and there is no indication of there being an end to it. The frequent and effective use made of deadly gases by the Germans in the present great offensive on the western front has been referred to quite frequently in the dispatches, especially the vicious mustard gas. This wicked concoction is projected in shells in a liquid or semi-liquid state and often in the nighttime. Being practically colorless, it adheres to branches, grass, or other objects until the sun comes up, when it volatilizes and becomes deadly. One of the worst features of it is that it is delayed in its action and is not felt for some time afterwards.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Nor seen and recognized?

Mr. TILSON. It is practically colorless and is not observed. I had a very interesting hour on last Saturday with a young man who was near the Ypres salient in August, 1917, about the time of the earliest use of this particular gas. He had been well trained in the use of the mask against chlorine and phosgene gases, but when it came to the use of the so-called mustard gas he could not tell me much about it, except that he got it. He could tell me only the effect it had on him, which was a very unfortunate one.

For the best of reasons I deem it best not to attempt to discuss the matter of our own use of noxious gases. While adhering to the opinion expressed at the first Hague conference that no such means should be employed in warfare, nevertheless by the act of the enemy the adoption of such means has been forced upon us, and I feel sure that those immediately responsible for the vigorous prosecution of the war are not neglecting the duty of making adequate preparation in this direction. I hope that we may not only meet fire with fire, but that our fire may prove the hotter.

On the other hand, it is altogether proper to discuss fully the subject of defense against gas attacks. In my judgment, no part of our preparation for this war is to-day in a more satisfactory state than our gas-defense service. The last three months have witnessed greater strides in this direction than the preceding nine months of the year since we entered the war, and those responsible for it are deserving of the highest credit.

On May 16, 1917, the Secretary of War directed that the Surgeon General should supply to the Army gas masks. The gas-defense service was organized as a part of the Sanitary Corps, and the first officer formally commissioned as major on June 26, 1917. From this small beginning the gas-defense service has expanded until at the present time it is an organization of 150 officers and a thousand enlisted men.

On June 27, 1917, the day the Belgian commission was received, I brought into the House samples of some of the gas masks that had been used up to that time by the French and British and one of the type we had just made to send to France for Pershing's first division. I gave the House the best information then obtainable to the effect that the mask then exhibited was effective against any gas theretofore used. Within 10 days from that day 20,000 of those masks were on the ocean going over. Before they reached the other side a new gas had been used, requiring a change of the hood fabric material as well as the chemicals in our mask, so that those 20,000 masks came back to us without having been opened.

No one can be sure that the masks we are now making, perfect as they are, effective as they are, against any known gas, no one can be certain, I say, that they will not be obsolete before midsummer. All we can say is that they are the best that can be produced now and that they serve the present purpose well. All we can do and the best that can be done is to see that our boys "over there" are well supplied with them, and this is now being done in a most satisfactory way.

It is well known to you all that the diffusion of gas by means of shells has become so general and so far behind the front lines that it is necessary for the horses to wear masks.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. McKENZIE. Can the gentleman give the committee any information as to the number of horses that have lost their lives on account of gas? Is there any available information on that subject?

Mr. TILSON. I have no absolute data on that subject, except to state to the gentleman that the number is considerable It was considered by Gen. Pershing of sufficient importance to warrant him in asking for masks for the horses, not only on account of the loss of the horses themselves, but on account of the disarrangement of the transportation and the blocking of the roads in case a gas shell should drop near and a horse should fall down from the effects of it.

The French use dogs also for war purposes, such as carrying messages, and have made masks for their dogs. We have not yet started the manufacture of dog masks. Pigeons also are used for carrying messages, and I am told that gas masks have been made for them.

We now have in operation two large factories for the manufacture of masks for men, and one complete plant for making horse masks. The rapidity with which these plants and the organizations to run them have been built up is little less than marvelous. Recently I went through one of the plants where men's masks are being made, examined carefully all the various operations, including the numerous inspections made after almost every distinct operation, and came away more than delighted with what I had seen. The completeness and thoroughness of the organization running this plant was especially pleasing.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know anything about a million or more masks that were made and rejected by Gen. Pershing—that had to be thrown in the wastebasket, so to speak—and that the people in charge came here and asked for appropriations to make more masks, without submitting the specifications to Gen. Pershing?

Mr. TILSON. I think the gentleman is referring to the very thing that I adverted to a moment ago.

Mr. MADDEN. I am asking if the gentleman knows whether any such thing as that happened?

Mr. TILSON. Not on the scale that the gentleman has indicated. The fact is that we made a considerable number of masks, the best we knew how to make up to that time, the best that Gen. Pershing or anybody else on the other side had indicated to us that we should make. We paid for them, and I guess they were expensive enough, and then we sent a part of them over. When they arrived they could not be used, and they were sent back. Those that were here had either to be changed so as to conform to the new requirements or else to be thrown away. That is the fact.

Mr. MADDEN. What happened? Were they thrown away?

Mr. TILSON. There was considerable salvage, as I understand, especially in the knapsack, which is practically the same as that now used. Doubtless the greater part of the entire mask was utilized.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman answer one more question? Did the parties having charge of the manufacture of the gas masks in the War Department submit the new masks to Gen. Pershing for his approval before they spent the money in making them?

Mr. TILSON. I can not tell the gentleman as to that. I know there has been some delay. There was plenty of time to go back and forth across the ocean a time or two, because this mustard gas was first used about the first of August of last year, and the preparation for the manufacture of our masks on a large scale was begun about the middle of January, 1918. It has proceeded since that time very rapidly.

Mr. MADDEN. If they have all been thrown away, what does the rapidity amount to?

Mr. TILSON. I can not tell the gentleman in actual figures, but I have no reason to believe that any great mistake has been made in this matter, beyond the natural mistake of making at first masks which were inadequate to protect against the newly discovered mustard gas.

Mr. MADDEN. The making of a million or two and throwing them away seems to have been a rather serious mistake.

Mr. TILSON. I am sure the gentleman is not accurate as to the number.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Connecticut said 20,000. There is a good deal of difference between 20,000 and a million.

Mr. TILSON. I said 20,000 were sent over. But I prefer not to digress into a discussion of what is comparatively an insignificant matter when considered in connection with saving of the lives of our soldiers.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I decline to yield further.

Mr. GORDON. I think the gentleman ought to make plain his answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. TILSON. I am unable to answer the figures given by the gentleman from Illinois by giving the exact number of the old type of mask that was manufactured, but I feel confident that the number stated by him is altogether too large. Otherwise, I think my answer is plain.

Just a few words as to how the organization of the plant visited was brought together will serve as typical of all. A very able business executive was found, and two other men of large business affairs, who were thoroughly skilled in two lines of business most nearly analogous to the work required in making gas masks. Of course, no one could be found who was experienced in making gas masks, for there were no such. You might not be able to guess the two lines of industry chosen as the most nearly analogous, but the gas-defense service guessed right the very first time.

One of the two men drafted for this most important work was a large manufacturer of corsets, thoroughly skilled in the use of the sewing machine, with all its accessories and possibilities. His resourcefulness as an office manager and planner soon demonstrated the wisdom of his selection. The other was a packer from Chicago who knows more about tin cans and how to handle them expeditiously and economically than any other man I ever saw. You see there is a tin canister containing the chemicals in each mask, and an extra one for each mask is provided.

Under these men are a number of able organization assistants, selected in many cases from among the business lieutenants of one of the three. The employees are carefully selected, those having immediate members of their families in the war being given preference.

Some of the signs displayed throughout the plant were interesting and impressive. They were for the most part superimposed upon appropriate liberty-loan posters, usually pictures of soldiers, and calculated to impress upon the workers the importance of dispatch and care in making the masks. One sign read, "Your loved one may not return unless he has a mask." Another read, "The mask you make may save his life."

The inspection throughout the many different operations impressed me as most thorough. I shall refer to only two specific instances. The first is of the rubber making the face piece. In a sheet about 30 inches wide on a roll, it is run between two steel rollers charged with high-voltage electricity. If there be the most minute pin prick the electric charge arcs through it, making it quite obvious to the eye of the inspector. The other is the final inspection, made by carefully selected enlisted men in a room which other persons are not permitted to enter. The masks are then placed in sealed packages and packed in heavy wooden boxes, ready for shipment to the battle front.

I have here a well-arranged exhibit, showing every part and operation in the manufacture of the mask. I shall not attempt to describe in detail the various parts which go into it, but you will readily see that it is no simple matter to make one of them.

There are 12 different types of masks here in my collection—10 for man and 2 for beast. I shall take them up one at a time.

First, let me show you the one now being turned out in large quantities for our troops. My friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FRANCIS], has volunteered to be the victim. He will put it on so that you may see it at close range as it is used in and near the front-line trenches. [Mr. FRANCIS puts on the mask.] It is known as the box respirator type, and is almost identical in outward design with the one shown here by me last June. It differs in the hood material and in the chemical used. The hood is now made of a rubber fabric that the gas can not penetrate. The eyes are of glass instead of celluloid, but the glass is made in layers, with celluloid between, so that it will crack but not shatter. The nose pincers are here to prevent breathing through the nose. The rubber mouthpiece goes in the mouth between the lips and the teeth. The breath comes out through this one-way flutter valve. This flexible tube extends from the opening connecting with the mouthpiece to the canister here in this knapsack affair, containing the neutralizing chemicals. The gas-charged air enters through the bottom of the canister, where it is filtered and purified, and reaches the mouth through this tube. After aerating the lungs it passes out through this flutter valve.

This is the way soldiers are equipped in order to fight or live at all when they are under gas. It is said that with their masks on the soldiers can live for at least 10 hours. I should like to ask the gentleman from New York how long he would like to live in it.

Mr. FRANCIS. About 10 minutes.

Mr. TILSON. It is in fact very uncomfortable to wear. When shells containing gas fall unexpectedly, as they often do, it is necessary to put on the mask very quickly. The soldier is trained to do it very expeditiously. Three soldiers, brave and true, now in the south gallery, will show just how it is done. They are Sergts. Day, Kirkham, and Emmons, of the gas-defense service. "Squad, attention." [The soldiers stood at attention.] The knapsack is now at the slung position in which it is carried from the time soldiers come within 10 or 12 miles of the front. Even at this distance gas shells may fall. In that case the command is given, "Gas."

At the command of Mr. TILSON the soldiers in the gallery put on their masks.

[Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. There being gas in the neighborhood to cause the alarm they would undoubtedly get some gas inside the mask, so it is necessary for them to empty the mask. Before I give that command I should, however, give another command, as it is very uncomfortable to carry the mask in that position. I shall now give the command, "Complete the adjustment." That is in order to make it more comfortable. Otherwise they must carry the weight of the mask from the mouthpiece in the mouth between the teeth and the lips, and it is a very heavy pull on the mouth unless the knapsack is strung up. Having completed the adjustment, the position which the men are now in is what is known as the "alert" position. I omitted giving one command, "Take off masks." [Soldiers removed masks.]

When they come within a distance of 2 miles of the front line they must carry their masks all the time in the alert position, which these men are now doing, the flaps of the knapsack open, so that they can get at the mask easily. Being already at the alert position, which they always take within 2 miles of the front line, from this position they are supposed to put on the masks in less time than before. They are supposed to do it in six seconds, and gentlemen can take the time if they wish. I shall now give the usual commands: "Gas." [The soldiers quickly put on masks. Applause.] "Empty masks." [The soldiers execute the command.] The gas soon dims the eyepiece and it must be cleaned. "Clean right eyepiece." "Clean left eyepiece." [The soldiers execute the commands as given.] No more gas shells having fallen, the commander comes to the conclusion there is no more gas, but he wishes to be sure of it, so by having them slightly release the nose clamps and raise the hood a little they can ascertain whether there is any gas still in the neighborhood. I shall give the command and the squad will illustrate it: "Test for gas." [The soldiers execute the command.] Having now ascertained that there is no more gas in the neighborhood, I shall give the last command: "Take off masks." [The soldiers remove masks. Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. How can the commanding officer give the order that the gentleman has just given with these masks on?

Mr. TILSON. He can do it. It is a very mumbling sort of order, but it can be understood by seeing what the commander himself is doing about this time. Then they also have signals, and along the line they have regular automobile horns.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. We have all heard of the form of gas that blisters not only the face but the body. What protection, if any, has been taken against that?

Mr. TILSON. They are making a sort of sou'wester suit that incloses the soldier all over, from head to foot, with straps under the boots, with a hood that goes over the head—in fact, a complete suit. It seems to me it would be very uncomfortable in hot weather. Certain men who have to handle the guns or anything where that substance is will have to wear that suit. It seems to me that soon there will be so many things necessary to be carried in order to protect a man's life that they are going to finally reach an impasse.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. And we are manufacturing those?

Mr. TILSON. A limited number of the oil suits, but we are manufacturing the masks in great numbers. It is the belief that we shall be able to manufacture without difficulty all that we need for ourselves and all that our allies may need.

Mr. GARNER. That is, the gas masks?

Mr. TILSON. The gas masks.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman says they are manufacturing the improvement of the mouthpiece, the second one to which he pointed?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. And they are experimenting with the other?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; the hard rubber.

Mr. GARNER. And if they fail to manufacture the second in order to get the third, we would criticize. If they failed to get the third and throw the others away, we would still criticize.

Mr. TILSON. I shall not criticize if they go on making the second till the third is ready to make. If the third is better, I shall not criticize if they throw away a few of the second when they get the third.

Mr. GARNER. I just want to mention that to show what an awful fix they are in.

Mr. TILSON. As I said on another occasion, in accordance with the scriptures, we ought "to prove all things," and improve everything we can, but we should not neglect to "hold fast that which is good," and which we have tried and know to be good. I think that has been one of our difficulties. We have been trying to get the absolutely ideal, and meanwhile we have not gotten anything at all, always looking forward to the time when we could have the very best.

Mr. GARNER. Then, the gentleman is not inclined to criticize if they go on and manufacture something they have, but afterward throw it away?

Mr. TILSON. To a reasonable degree; no. I do not think anybody is subject to that criticism. They would be subject to criticism if they did not take every precaution to have enough masks and to be sure they did have enough masks to protect all of the men they are going to send within the danger zone.

The gas is heavier than air, so it goes down into the dugout or trench. It is so heavy that it stays there on the bottom, so they have invented this tool which I show you to take up the gas. It takes quite a little knack to use it. The idea is to bring the tool up flat, so as to bring the gas up with it.

I wish to spend the rest of the time allotted to me in a description of these masks. This one which I show you now is a French mask, the same as I presented to you almost a year ago, except that the face piece has better material in it, to keep out the new gas, and it has been impregnated with the new kind of chemicals, to take care of the new gas. I am informed that the French are also making some of the box-respirator type.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman one question. Do our people understand the component elements of the "mustard" gas?

Mr. TILSON. I could not inform the gentleman as to that. I suppose they are studying it. Perhaps the gentleman from Illinois, Dr. FOSTER, could tell the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I think so. They have analyzed it here.

Mr. HARDY I shall not ask whether they use it against the enemy, but I hope they do.

Mr. TILSON. Here is the Italian mask, which is much like the French mask, except that they carry it in a tin box. Upon it in large letters in Italian is a warning to the effect that he who leaves off this mask dies, and that he should always keep it with him.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman tell us what mask our men are now using?

Mr. TILSON. Our men are now using the middle one on the board, the same one the gentleman from New York wore. It is the middle one on the board here [pointing].

Mr. SNYDER. That is of our own manufacture?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. SNYDER. And they are not using masks other than our own manufacture?

Mr. TILSON. Well, I can not tell the gentleman, but I know that January last marked the beginning of a large manufacture of these masks.

Mr. SNYDER. But just previous to that they were using masks made also by France?

Mr. TILSON. I am not quite sure as to that, but I think we had some from Great Britain.

Mr. SNYDER. They are as well fixed for masks as any of the other armies at this time?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. So they are not without proper protection as far as masks are concerned?

Mr. TILSON Probably what the gentleman has in mind is that they were not masks of our manufacture.

Mr. SNYDER. What I had in mind was to be sure our men did have protection of masks, notwithstanding the fact they did not have those of our manufacture.

Mr. LOBECK. Is the mask the soldiers in the gallery used the one our soldiers are using now?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. The mask the soldiers used in the gallery is the same one I have in my collection. It is the one the gentleman from New York put on. The third one on the board has only a very slight improvement, making it fit the head better, but it is really the same thing.

Mr. HARDY. Was the masks used by the soldiers made in America?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes; they were made in America.

Unfortunately for the rest and comfort of the soldiers, the gas shells are about as apt to fall in the night as in the day, so that it often becomes necessary for men to sleep in their masks, if they sleep at all. I believe the gentleman from New York will testify that it would be very difficult for anyone to sleep in that mask. In fact, no one could sleep with those clasps on his nose; therefore this mask [indicating] has been devised for that purpose. You will note the air ducts leading to the eyes and the breathing arrangement here. This is known as the Tissot mask. It is made out of very soft, pliable rubber, and has ventilation to the eyes so that the eyepiece will not dim and the breathing arrangement here so that nothing has to go into the mouth. It is so soft that a man, if he is sufficiently exhausted, can lie down and sleep in it.

This one is known as the P. H. helmet, which the British were using as a secondary mask and which I showed here last June. It is not considered now as proof against gas for a very long time and is rapidly going out of use.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What does the enemy use?

Mr. TILSON. I am going to show that in a moment. Here is something which will throw a little light on an international matter of considerable interest in this country. We all wondered why the Russians completely broke down. I have wondered if it were not, when they discovered that they had to wear such things as this [illustrating] in order to live at all, that the Bolsheviki decided they had better quit. This is a Russian mask.

Here is a mask taken from a captured German a very short time ago. The receptacle which contains the chemicals is very much smaller than ours and lasts a shorter time. Therefore each man has to carry an extra one of these lamp-body affairs with him. You will note that the face piece is made of leather instead of rubber. The German mask that I saw last year had rubber of a rather poor quality, but the masks they have been taking from the Germans recently have no rubber at all. They use leather for the face of the mask. The elastic bands that hold the mask to the face and make it conform to the shape of the head instead of being rubber are made of wire spring sewed up in cloth. That would indicate that there is a shortage of rubber in Germany. I am glad to see a shortage of something over there. [Applause.]

As I told you a few moments ago, horses also must have masks, and we have one complete factory in this country now turning out horse masks. I have one here, fully impregnated, that will protect a horse. It is the one now on this horse's head. Unless you were close to detect the odor you would not realize a great difference between the mask we are now making for our horses and the British horse mask. Here is the British mask. It is sewed instead of riveted. It must be entirely impregnated, including the elastic band, which soon puts the elastic band out of business. Our mask is riveted, so that this part which goes around the bridle is not impregnated, neither is the elastic band, which I think is an improvement. You will notice that the upper part of the horse's nose is all that is necessary to be covered.

A MEMBER. What about the eyes?

Mr. TILSON. You have often heard of a horse laugh, but never of a horse cry. The eyes of a normal horse do not lachrymate. A horse has the good sense to breathe through his nose. There is no necessity of putting a mask over his mouth, which materially simplifies the problem.

The captain in charge of this particular work is as proud of it as a pair of newlyweds of their first baby; and well he may be, for it is a necessary as well as humane work, being done most efficiently and in the finest possible spirit.

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman care to say anything about what we are doing offensively, as to the character of the gas?

Mr. TILSON. As I said earlier in my remarks, I thought we had better not discuss that at all, because even the dropping of a hint might be of advantage to the enemy if communicated to him. I feel that we are doing the work properly, and owing to the peculiar nature of the work I think we ought not to talk about it. [Applause.]

It is a great satisfaction to be able to speak so favorably, so enthusiastically, of the progress being made in this highly important field of defensive preparation. Fortunately, the gas mask is not made of metal, except to a minor degree, and does not require the special tools, dies, jigs, and gauges necessary to make arms, ammunitions, and airplanes. This fact detracts in no way from the credit due to those who have had this work in charge. In my judgment, the gas-defense service is now justifying its name. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the wolf still yelps at my heels. Two years ago, using the fable of the Wolf and the Lamb as an illustration, I spoke of the real cause of the opposition to me. As I then said, I am the Representative of the whole people of my district, but I wear the collar of none; I refuse to submit to the dictation of selfish interests or to be the tool of big business; I am too much interested in the cause of labor and the oppressed, too much the friend of the common man, to be acceptable to those in my district who consider themselves as belonging to a superior class. In the words of Mirabeau, "In all countries, in all times, the aristocracies have implacably pursued every friend of the people." The shoddy American aristocracy of riches is the most vindictive of them all.

Two years ago the people of my district passed judgment upon me in an election in which I was opposed by two popular men, with the result that I received 76 per cent of the total vote, while my opponents together received 24 per cent. I carried every voting box in Jefferson County.

Confronted with this evidence of the people's approval, the wolves slunk away temporarily, but soon returned to snarl at my heels. They have hounded me persistently since my first election. They have criticized me; they have nagged me; I could do nothing to please them. They have sought to distract my attention from my duties. I have had to stop from time to time to kick them away. Now, confronted with the prospect that I will again be reelected, they gnash their fangs in desperation and would tear me limb from limb. They fear that it is now or never; that I will soon become so well entrenched that it will be hopeless to drag me down. They are making a last desperate effort, sparing no pains nor trouble, regarding neither honor nor truth in their attacks.

I proved that I did not muddy their water and that neither I nor my brother insulted them, and now they say that I am not a real lamb. These wolves in sheep's clothing with lamb's wool in their teeth—they claim that I am not a real lamb, and that therefore they should devour me.

They say that I am not good enough American for them—not a patriot. The News and Age-Herald say that I am not patriot enough for them and the mammon worshippers for whom they speak—not good enough for Editor Glass and Editor Barrett, twin pickles, one in conceit and alcohol, the other in his own venom—Glass and Barrett, neither of whom ever had a patriotic thought or ever did a patriotic deed—Glass and Barrett, who hate each other with all the bitterness of their small souls, who feel for each other merited and measureless contempt. Heaven help me if I be not good enough for such as they!

And little "Me, Too," the Ledger, peeps out of its hole to squeak at me. The weakest of the lot—but I pause, "Brave spirits war not with the dead."

PAYING FOR THE WAR.

Next to soldiers, money is the most needed thing to win the war. Lloyd-George said that the war will be won with silver bullets, and this is nearly true. Our brave soldiers will die in France in vain if by unwise financiering we bankrupt our country and become unable to supply them with munitions of war. Every true patriot is concerned in seeing that proper financial measures for the support of the war are adopted. The Congressman who does not interest himself in this question is lacking in a proper sense of responsibility.

The question of financing the war was one of the first to which President Wilson gave consideration. In his war message of April 2, 1917, after advising a declaration of war against Germany he proceeded to discuss what the war would involve. He said:

> It will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits to the Government, sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well-conceived taxation. I say sustained so far as may be equitable by taxation because it seems to me that it would be unwise to base the credits which will now be necessary entirely on money borrowed. It is our duty, I most respectfully urge, to protect our people so far as we may against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans.

President Wilson warned Congress against "the inflation which would be produced by vast loans." He held that the financial burden of the war should be sustained so far as equitable "by the present generation, by well-conceived taxation."

I approved the President's reasoning. Though not always willing to go blindly where he points, I respect his master intellect. And as the financial view which he expressed agreed with my own I was glad to support his plan for financing the war. The war-revenue bill presented by Secretary McAdoo was framed on the plan to pay half of the war cost by bonds and half by taxation. This bill had the President's approval, passed with my support, and is the law now in effect.

However, the cost of the war began to run higher than had been calculated. An additional bond issue was authorized by Congress last fall, and recently the third liberty loan was authorized. This brings the total bond issues up to the stupendous sum of $14,000,000,000, or $140 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. But notwithstanding the repeated bond issues and the many billions increase of the public debt no increase in taxes on profits has been made. Congress did not adhere to the President's plan of paying half the war cost from bonds and half from taxation. Whether the President changed his mind I do not know. I do not think that he did change. I rather think that the big business and financial interests who are making millions out of the war and who would have been compelled to pay the increased taxes are so powerful that Congress has been unable to carry out the President's plan.

Our present rate of taxation on war profits is much lower than the British rate. On concerns earning as much as $500,000,000 our rate is roughly 32 per cent, the British rate is 25 per cent on profits up to the three prewar-year average, and 80 per cent upon war profits. Under our rates we will collect for 1917 $3,500,000,000, which is less than one-fourth of our expenditures. Had we adopted the British rate our collections for the same period would have been from $2,500,000,000 to $3,000,000,000 more, or a total of not less than $5,000,000,000. For instance, the United States Steel Corporation will pay for 1917 taxes $233,000,000. Had that corporation been located in Great Britain it would pay on the same earnings $387,000,000, so that the Steel Corporation by paying the American rate instead of the British rate saves $154,000,000, and is able to pay its stockholders 49 cents on the dollar for 1917 alone.

I have viewed the repeated bond issues with great apprehension. I see the evils which the President predicted transpiring before my own eyes. Prices of all commodities have increased 21 per cent since we entered the war. This is the direct result of repeated bond issues. A great inflation of circulation has resulted, gold money has disappeared. The American dollar is now below par in foreign countries. Mr. McAdoo advises that we melt our silver money into bars as the silver in the dollar is worth more than 100 cents. The country's financial situation is rapidly growing worse.

Recently in voting for the third liberty loan I felt it my duty to call attention to the situation and to urge that taxes be laid upon the war profiteers. I supported the President's position as given in his war message. I was met by the assertion that greater taxes would cripple business, that business could not afford to pay more than was now being paid. I subsequently answered this by calling attention to the enormous profits that are being made by the great industrial concerns. I took up particularly the case of the Steel Corporation and showed that by its own admission it had made for 1917, after paying all taxes and charges of every kind, 49 cents on every dollar of the par value of its common stock; and pointed out that if the true facts were known it had earned perhaps 100 per cent on its common stock.

My exposure of the profiteering of the Steel Trust was in good faith. Perhaps I forgot for the moment that it controlled the press and powerful political influences in my district; perhaps I forgot or maybe I had courage enough to tell the truth in behalf of the public welfare, even though it meant my own ruin.

However that may be, I make no apology to the Steel Trust or to its hirelings, its editors, its sycophants, its parasites, its bootlickers, or its deluded friends, who can see no wrong in anything it may do. I did my duty as I saw it, and whether I shall sink or swim, it was a patriotic action and will redound to the Nation's welfare.

PATRIOTS AND PROFITEERS.

But it seems that I laid my hand upon the "Ark of the Covenant"; that is, the only ark of the covenant that a certain element in my district care about. I raised my hand against their idol, and I must be punished. There was scurrying to and fro, mines were laid, plans formed, and a plot concocted for my quick undoing.

My speech was made on April 6. On April 9 a notable gathering was held in the Tutwiler Hotel in Birmingham—that splendid hostelry, the center of extravagance and display of the swagger and fashion in my city. But this occasion was a worthy one. The object of the meeting was to promote the sale of liberty bonds. Numerous wealthy business men had gathered around the well-loaded board. It was a congenial and prosperous company, and soon speeches were declared in order. The occasion was a patriotic one, in which men's nobler and self-sacrificing instincts were to be appealed to. But always there are those who are willing to pervert a patriotic occasion to base political ends. The Tutwiler luncheon was no exception. There were those present who were willing to endanger the bond campaign in order to do me an injury. When patriotic fervor had reached its height up rose the pastor of a fashionable Episcopal Church in my city and proceeded to climb the ladder of eloquent praise for America and denunciation of her foes. Evidently this gentleman of the cloth classed me as one of the latter, for he said:

> We ought to conscript every man who is capable of working in the industrial plants or in the offices, at the lathe in the munition plants, or in the factory, or at the typewriter—every man in his place, taking everyone that is needed to win this war; and while we are at it we might conscript a Congressman who is in sympathy with the sentiment in this community and who will represent this people and that great sentiment in Congress.

And having paid me this tribute, he proceeded to demolish the Germans by saying:

> America was buffeted on one cheek by Germany and she turned the other one. She was buffeted on that one, and then all scriptural law was fulfilled. And now, by God we are going to lick Germany.

The quotations are taken from the News's report of the speech. Still, I presume they are correct.

Evidently there were a number of conscriptionists at the meeting, for the News says that the pastor's reference to conscription, including the conscription of a Congressman, was cheered mightily. And so we have the key to the sentiments of the speaker and his cheerers and the platform of the candidate for Congress whom they will conscript. Conscription not only for the Army but for industry—dragging men from their homes to serve in the ranks and also to toil in the factories and on the farm. Conscription of men and women, too, not only for war service but for the service of the great profit-making corporations, so that millionaires may be multiplied and our Nation's resources monopolized. Conscription not only for times of war but to maintain vast standing armies even after peace has come, for that is what the Birmingham papers preach and the speaker and his cheerers want. They would not allow the humble workers of America to put aside the yoke of military service with the coming of peace, but would keep them trained for future wars and future opportunities for profiteering and plundering.

These conscriptionists believe in conscripting our boys for soldiers and men and women to toil in the factories and on the farm, but always they have in mind the conscription of the humble and the poor. They do not favor conscription for themselves. If it should be proposed to conscript one of them to follow a plow or roll a wheelbarrow or beat hot iron—to take him away from his luxurious home and to put him to doing some useful work for the country—he would resent it to the death. These conscriptionists believe in conscription of human beings, but not of dollars. They consider that they are making a sacrifice equal to that of the soldiers who do the fighting when they lend money to the Government at a good rate of interest in nontaxable bonds. If it should be proposed to conscript money and big industrial plants to carry on the war they would howl that the pillars of civilization were being pulled down. Human beings may be conscripted, they say, but property is sacred.

But the speaker went too far. There at least is no need to conscript a candidate for Congress to oppose me. Dozens of ambitious men want my job, dozens of them have had their lightning rods up for months, but they have been afraid. If only the small but powerful influences which were at work at the Tutwiler will give the word these would-be candidates will spring to the task. It is an intolerable evil of political conscription that the selection is made by the elect few, and the candidate when chosen knows well the source of the honor. The favored one will be the candidate not of the people but of his conscriptors. He will not stand on his own merit, but upon the support and money of the few who select him. The "hand-picked one," if he should succeed me, will be the Representative not of the people as a whole but of a few big corporations and their puppets. Oh, unhappy the day when the people of my district are thus mistreated, and when their Congressman is merely the tool of the selfish and avaricious.

THE PLOT THICKENS.

It is obvious that the attack on me was prearranged. Taking it as a text, the News followed with a column of coarse editorial abuse and dishonest criticism. Then the Age-Herald took the matter up with a report which deliberately misrepresented my speech exposing the Steel Trust, and at the next liberty loan luncheon a cut-and-dried resolution was sprung, condemning my speech and charging that I did not faithfully represent my constituents in my position. And on Sunday morning the Age-Herald cartooned me on its front page as a Bolshevik, and the News reiterated its false criticisms.

The whole "flare-up" was obviously a conspiracy. Birmingham had been worked to a fever heat of patriotism in the sale of liberty bonds and was responding nobly to the call, but these narrow and venomous partisans had no respect for that. They would ruin the sale of the bonds if thereby they could injure me. I attacked their god—the Steel Trust. I questioned the good faith of the great war contractors. I criticized the profiteers and money worshipers. I said that no man has the right to come out of this war richer than he went into it. I sought to make the people who are making money out of this war devote their profits to paying for it. I tried to protect coming generations and babes yet for a hundred years unborn. Therefore I am unpatriotic, I must be politically sandbagged. The resolution condemning my speech was passed by men few or none of whom had read it.

MY RECORD.

The Birmingham papers from the very first have sought to discredit me. They have misrepresented and criticized whenever that course was possible. They have belittled and ridiculed whenever they could, and for the rest have ignored me altogether. During the trying times of last spring and summer they nagged and hectored me in nearly every issue. Whatever I did they criticized as wrong. They commanded me with threats what to do and scolded and misrepresented what I did. The pitiable Ledger, after remaining on the fence for weeks on conscription, came out just before the vote was taken with a bluster as to what would happen to me if I did not vote for it, and later ridiculed my speech against it and called it a "tirade." I sent out the speech to show my constituents the reasons for my vote, and now the Ledger and the News quarrel with me for sending out the speech. Had I had these papers' principles I would have waited to see which way the crowd went and then been the loudest shouter of them all.

The News and Age-Herald have steadily misrepresented me. Of the two perhaps the News has been the least despicable, for its editor has done his own lying, while the Age-Herald has set its hired slanderers to sandbag me. These papers have tried to create an atmosphere of disloyalty about me. They have reiterated that I was opposing the administration and had set myself up in antagonism to the President. There are honest people among my constituents who have been misled into actually believing such things. The assassin of political reputation is as despicable as the slanderer of private character.

The real fact is that in all respects necessary to stand the acid test of loyalty as described by the President in his recent letter on the Wisconsin situation, I have proven 100 per cent pure. Of the dozens of measures relating to the war, either directly or indirectly, in only three have I voted against what was reported as the judgment of officers of the administration. Those three are the conscription bill, the espionage bill, and the explosives bill. I challenge my critics to show to the contrary. I have been willing to vote for every soldier, every ship, and ever dollar needed to carry on the war.

I will be frank. I have voted for the measures proposed, not because some officer of the administration advised it but because they met the approval of my judgment. I have not been a rubber-stamp Congressman, but have tried to weigh patriotically every measure presented and to vote for the best interest of my country. It is I who am Congressman. It is I who took the oath of office. It is I who must face my conscience and my Maker. And always I have felt that I must make the final decision for myself. For this frame of mind I offer no man an apology.

The Age-Herald libels me in a cartoon as a "Bolshevik." Poor dolt. He does not see that it is he and those for whom he speaks and the propaganda that he carries on that makes the Industrial Workers of the World possible. I am standing for old-fashioned Americanism, for the America of our fathers, and for American liberties, for freedom of speech, of conscience, and for real democracy. He would have all the vast wealth of this great young Republic collected into the coffers of a superior class and used by them with a free hand to oppress the great masses. He and his kind are driving for the same conditions in America that produced the Bolsheviki in Russia—he the bourgeois—while I would stay the rapacity of exploitation and strive toward conditions where there would be few millionaires and no anarchists, but reasonable plenty for all.

I pass by the coarse abuse of the News so far as it relates to my personal qualities. Such piffling and contemptible criticism is not to be dignified by notice. Glass criticizes me for having obtained the discharge from service of a number of soldiers. In every case the soldiers were boys of 16 and 17 or were physically unfit for service. The military laws required that they be discharged. As the servant of my constituents I merely presented the facts to the authorities. No favoritism was shown nor political pull exerted. These boys were unfit for service; they should never have been recruited. Glass's criticism is as dishonest as it is petty.

Glass says I am a Socialist. This is false, and he knew it was false when he wrote it. He says that consciously or unconsciously I have cooperated with German propagandism. There is only one answer appropriate to be made to such a statement. He lied. Lied deliberately and maliciously, not in heat, but cold-bloodedly and basely, to do me an injury.

I realize what power the press has; how it may mold public opinion; how, by base innuendoes, it may destroy the proudest reputation; how it may create around the noblest character an atmosphere of hatred and disgust. I realize what a load I carry in the united opposition of the Birmingham dailies; how I am cut off from my people and can not reach them except through an occasional speech, which my foul-hitting critics would deny me the poor privilege of sending. I realize how impossible is the task of my sending the truth to overtake their misrepresentations. But I am undismayed. I confront the plot against me with calm and untroubled faith that God is in heaven and justice will triumph.

The fight on me is not one in which I alone am interested. It is a fight against me because I am the people's Representative. It is a fight against the people and would deprive them of the right to choose their own spokesman. It is the fight of the selfish, the insincere, the false patriot, the money worshiper, the parasites of big business against the toiling masses. I have been selected as a victim because I have dared to criticize the profiteers and war contractors. I have dared to stand for the rights of men above the interests of property. I have dared to have humanity as my watchword instead of greed.

Let no man be deceived as to the issue. There is no question of my patriotism by any honest man who knows the facts. I have served my country as a private soldier in time of war, which not one of my critics has done. My life is an open book of service to my fellow man, and I appeal to that. The real question is whether the Steel Trust and the selfish interests and their hirelings shall have them a little Congressman of their own in the Birmingham district or will the whole people be represented.

The daily papers, except for the spleen of their editors, do not attack me because of any principles or convictions of their own, for they have none. They are merely the tools of those higher up, of the big business interests who are their masters.

THE BIRMINGHAM DAILIES.

How sweet it is for brethren to dwell together in unity. Hating each other as only the jealous can, cutting each other's throats at every chance, feeling for each other the deepest contempt—the Birmingham dailies are united for the first time in opposition to me. Oh, happy I, that have enabled the rabbit, the monkey, and the serpent to sing in sweet harmony.

Barrett and Glass, what a fine pair they are to teach patriotism and high-mindedness to a community! And now they are united in libeling their Congressman. Happy they must be in such a genial association. Lately they were caterwauling at each other, and Barrett published his opinion of Glass in a double column, from which I quote these chaste extracts:

Frank P. Glass, the editor of the Birmingham News, whose principal object in life is to criticize others in the columns of his newspaper, who has always been the puppet of some politician, and who has always sought to be a political leader without achieving an iota of success, is out in a long diatribe in his newspaper yesterday afternoon criticizing an article over the signature of Ned Brace in Sunday's Age-Herald.

Again:

This man Glass, of the Birmingham News, has been dirty and sneaking so long that both the editor of the Age-Herald and the respectable public are disgusted with him.

Again:

The mighty Ned Brace to whom he refers was not in the Montgomery conference. There were some splendid gentlemen in that conference, into which that pirate of journalism, Frank P. Glass, injected himself. There were men in that conference who were fighting for a principle. Would that the editor of the Birmingham News had been doing likewise, rather than possibly watching for the shekels that might be strewn in this State by those with an ax to grind.

Frank Glass in his newspaper career has always had such a keen scent for campaign funds that it is difficult for him to distinguish the difference between the editor of principle and patriotism and the editor who merely follows the train of the dollar.

Again referring to the way in which Glass treated the administration's coal-saving order, he said:

Yet this man Glass, this venal editor of the Birmingham News, saw fit to criticize his administration vigorously when it endeavored to conserve coal by closing on Mondays industries and department stores which advertise on Sundays. This editor was looking to the dollar in the advertising columns of his Sunday newspaper. When the dollar and patriotism were placed side by side—when the dollar and the support of the boys at the front were in parallel columns—he chose the dollar.

I have not at hand what Glass said about Barrett. I remember that he charged Barrett with having betrayed the whisky cause, which he had long championed. What each really thinks of the other would be unfit to print. God pity and save them both—if He consistently can.

From the very first the Birmingham dailies tried to bludgeon me into submitting to their dictation. They want a humble, servile Congressman whom they can dictate to and when I ignored their hectoring they split their lungs with criticism. The attack on me has been carefully planned for months. The papers suspended their criticisms last fall. They saw that the people were getting tired of their scolding me. I then predicted that they were waiting until the opening of the congressional campaign. The "flare-up" is merely the enemy's great spring offensive long planned and carefully prepared. They are dishonest in assigning my speech as the reason. It is merely a false excuse which they give for what they had intended to do had I not made the speech. I will send the speech they criticized to my constituents. I challenge any honest man after reading it to point out where I made any criticism of the President or of any officer of the Government. To the contrary, that speech advocated carrying out the financial policy favored by the President in his war message.

The Birmingham dailies evidently think the people are fools. I do not think so. To the contrary, I know that they are not fools and I know that the instinct for a square deal and fair play is strong in the hearts of my constituents. I know that they will resent the unprincipled attacks on me. I know that they will not allow my dishonest critics to intimidate them. The great mass of the people in my district look on me as their friend and champion. They will accept as an attack on themselves the efforts for my political assassination. I am receiving dozens of letters with promises of support. The people are with me.

My answer to the false criticisms of my opposition is my announcement for Congress. There will be no backdown on my part. We will put this thing up to the people and let them decide. I give fair warning to all if I should be again chosen as Congressman from the ninth district I will continue as I have in the past to do my duty as He gives me light to see it. I will be no rubber stamp. I will wear no man's collar. I will listen to advice from all and consider it carefully, but I will make the decision myself. I will not submit to dictation from any interest, no matter how rich or powerful, but prayerfully and humbly as a patriot should and with a just sense of responsibility in this hour of the Nation's peril I will serve my country and my people with the best that in me lies.

I have no support from the daily press, no way to reach my constituents except through my speeches. Therefore in order to answer my critics I am forced to use this method. I shall send this address to my constituents. The papers, of course, will criticize, villify, and ridicule it and me, but I am willing to endure this for my convictions. If by making this fight for the people I may be of benefit to them and to my country, I am willing to suffer.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the committee will have to rise about 3 o'clock for a most important matter, and for that reason I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY] that the remainder of the general debate be reserved until after that time, so that we may go ahead with the consideration of the bill now under the five-minute rule. I might say that when the committee does rise at 3 o'clock an important bill will be considered in the House, and after that I expect to go back into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of District legislation. If the gentleman has somebody that is anxious for time just now, I have no serious objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I want one minute of the time, if the chairman has no objection.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, are we considering now the bill H. R. 10894?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We are under general debate.

Mr. WHEELER. Why does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY] control the time on this side, when he is for the bill, and we have a minority report here against the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman was recognized because he is the ranking member on the committee.

Mr. WHEELER. He is not entitled to the division of time over here. He is for the bill. I do not want any time myself, but——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WHEELER] wants time, he can have mine.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not want any time myself. I do not know whether the other Members who signed this report do or not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. So far as I am concerned, the gentleman can have all the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to state that there was a unanimous consent conferring the control of half of the time on the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and half on the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY]. The Chair is given no alternative in the premises.

Mr. WHEELER. The chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Wisconsin are both for the measure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can only say to the gentleman from Illinois that we are operating under the unanimous-consent rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY] desire recognition or does the gentleman from Wisconsin agree to accede to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY] might use some of his time now.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the chairman of the committee yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Under the present regulations, as I understand it, all officers of the Army and Navy are permitted to purchase supplies at the departments suggested in this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is my information.

Mr. DOWELL. This bill then is intended to cover officers outside of the Army and Navy?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is intended to cover Government employees who are not in the Army or Navy.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any reason, so far as the gentleman knows, why that will in any way assist in expediting the work in these departments?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can say, in my opinion it will expedite the business very materially if the clerks who are working for the Government here in time of war can buy their groceries and supplies more cheaply in one place than in another. It will mean that more of them will be willing to work for the Government than otherwise would. I will say to the gentleman that we are not now discussing the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. DOWELL. Can the gentleman suggest any reason why Members of Congress should be included in this list, as provided in section 2?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There may not be any reason for the gentleman to be included in it, but there is for me and others that I know, and that is that I can buy my groceries 33⅓ per cent cheaper than from a grocery without charging the taxpayers anything, and I want to do it because I need the money. [Laughter.]

Is it not correct that the gentleman is a bachelor and lives at a hotel?

Mr. DOWELL. That is immaterial. The question is whether Members of Congress shall do what other citizens of the United States shall not do. They ought not to be preferred. I am opposed to giving them any privilege that is not extended to all American citizens.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. We will come to that a little later.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for one minute.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the Members of the House have been very much interested in the remarks that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] has made this morning on the subject of gas and gas masks. Most of the Members here will probably recall his speech on the same subject last June. I wonder if they remembered, as they heard the speech to-day, that the man whom the colonel used a year ago to exhibit the method of wearing the masks was the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HEINTZ], whom we all love and who is now with the colors. I wonder if Members of the House have reflected that perhaps at this very moment he is putting to practical use, the most practical use possible, the lessons which we had together here in the House a year ago.

I rose simply to express the hope that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HEINTZ] in camp might read these words in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and might know that his colleagues are still thinking of him and are still wishing him every success. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY] is recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if there is nobody who desires to use time under general debate I ask that the bill be read for amendment under the five-minute rule, and then if there is time we can resume the general debate.

Mr. CARY. I have the name of one Member who wishes some time on this side in general debate.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Let that be deferred until later.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky requests that the general debate be now suspended, and that the bill be read for amendment under the five-minute rule, the general debate to be resumed on the completion of the bill under the five-minute rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all officers and employees of the United States who reside in the District of Columbia shall be permitted to purchase supplies from such commissary stores as may be operated by either the Subsistence Division of the Quartermaster Department of the United States Army or by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts of the United States Navy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I wish to say that I do not offer it as a committee amendment, but one on my own initiative.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky: Strike out the words "who reside in the District of Columbia" in lines 3 and 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 14.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I think we had better have tellers. The amendment has not been deb ted, and it is not understood. I did not understand it, and I ask unanimous consent to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent, pending his demand for tellers, to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. This would make the United States purchaser for all of its employees, if this amendment were agreed to, everywhere, of every kind, in the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It would.

Mr. CANNON. If this is not voted down, I am willing to move to strike out the whole thing. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois demands tellers, and the gentleman from New York makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and Mr. GARNER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration H. R. 10894, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 286 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he presented the names of the absentees to be entered in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment proposed by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. Does the gentleman desire to debate his motion?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on my motion. There is not one-thousandth part as much reason or justice in permitting the employees of the Government to purchase their food and other supplies from the quartermaster stores of the Army as there would be to permit the men who dig the sewers and pave the streets and do the common labor of the United States to do that. They are the men who furnish the facilities, the transportation, everything that goes to make up the health of every community in the land, and they toil for not to exceed one-half the compensation that the Government employees receive. Why should we make the Government employees a preferred class?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that there are 9,000 men working in the navy yard here, and there will be more, who will need the provisions of this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. That may be true; but there are 110,000,000 people in the United States, and they ought to be given consideration, and there ought not to be any law passed giving to any preferred class rights that do not go to every other class in the country.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I take it this bill is, of course, a war measure. I will ask the gentleman if he has any information as to whether or not the Quartermaster General of the Army or the Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts of the Navy has been consulted as to whether this is proper legislation or not?

Mr. MADDEN. I have no information, and I doubt if anybody else has.

Mr. McKENZIE. I wish to say to my colleague, for the information of gentlemen of the House, that no such proposition as this has been submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know all the facts in the case, but I do know this, that we ought to maintain the War Department for those who are engaged in war, and we should in no instance pamper the civil employees of the Government and discriminate against every man, woman, and child in the United States who happens by some unfortunate chance not to be on the Government pay roll.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does not the gentleman think the Quartermaster's Department and the Supply Division of the Navy Department would be unable to meet this increased demand?

Mr. MADDEN. I have no information on that. Whether they are able or not, it is not right, it is not fair, it is not just, to the rest of the American people, and we ought not under any circumstances to enact such a law.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think the gentleman is entirely correct about that. I think the Government clerks ought to have better salaries, and I have voted for that. We have also appropriated $10,000,000 to build them houses to live in here in Washington. I think that is enough. This proposition is to go still further and give them grub at cut rates—and Congressmen, too. This will, of course, increase the expenses of the Government, and I am opposed to any such socialistic proposition.

Mr. ROSE. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he does not think that the second section of this bill is infinitely worse than the charge that was made that Congressmen had attempted to exempt themselves from taxation?

Mr. MADDEN. I am not going to criticize what Congress did with respect to taxation. I do not believe any Member of Congress ever thought he was voting for a law that did not tax him the same as every other man in the United States was taxed.

Mr. ROSE. They did not; and that is the point I want to bring out.

Mr. MADDEN. But whatever we do here, it ought to be universal. This law ought not to be enacted to give special favors to a special class. The men and women who are on the Government pay roll are receiving high compensation, much higher than the men and women who are working in other lines of industry throughout the United States, and I am against this special legislation.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that while Members of Congress did not any of them knowingly vote to exempt themselves from taxation, if we vote for this we do it with our eyes open.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course. You can not make any excuse at all that you did not know about it. And anyway, regardless of whether you vote for this or not, or whether you know about it or not, every man who is interested in the welfare of the Army of the United States, and who is anxious to promote the successful conduct of the war, and is anxious also to supply the needs of the men who have gone to the front would resent the enactment of any law to place the civil employees of the Government on a par with the soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am opposed to that provision in section 2 which permits Members of Congress to avail themselves of the privilege accorded by this bill. I hope that the motion to strike out the enacting clause will not be adopted, but that when we get to section 2 we may strike out line 10 in so far as it relates to Members of Congress.

It is all right to talk about the employees of the Government being a favored class. They are employees of the Government. They are here from all over the United States. This House has recently raised their salaries for the very purpose that they might live. The House has considered the question with regard to rents, so that profiteers might not take the rest of the money these employees earn.

This bill means nothing else than that the Government has these supplies, has the buildings, can get the extra assistance if it is necessary, and that these men and women who are here, who are as necessary as any other branch of the Government to assist in winning this war, may not be harassed, may not be driven from their homes, may have sufficient things to eat and to wear, and so that all the money you have provided for them may not be taken from them by the profiteer, not only in rents but in clothing, in groceries, and things that they live upon. Can there be any reason why the Government should not supply these things, when it will not cost the Government a cent? They will pay enough in addition to the cost of these things to pay the expense of the extra help; and instead of raising salaries in the Capital of this Nation, and instead of raising more money, you will simply say that these men and women, these girls and young men from all over the United States, may be recognized in their own Capital, and that they may get their money's worth here instead of being simply fleeced.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield now. There can be no argument, except the one that we are treating one class different from the other. These are Government employees. You furnish certain men in the Navy, do you not? You furnish certain men in the Army this right, do you not? Can there be any reason why you should not extend it to the rest of the Government employees in the District of Columbia in order that you may give them the same recognition and consideration?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I can not yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman has asked the question himself.

Mr. RAKER. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would the gentleman from California favor this bill if he knew that the War Department had stated that it was not advisable?

Mr. RAKER. Sure I would.

A MEMBER. Is it a war measure?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Would the gentleman favor it as a war measure?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. That is simple and easy. The trouble is that some gentlemen only look at one side of this. The War Department looks at one side of it, forgetting that there are 20,000 young men and women here whose help must be had, and there seems to me there can be no objection to it.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the gentleman think for a minute that the Commissary Department could supply all the employees of the Government at this time?

Mr. RAKER. Of course it could.

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the gentleman think that it has all it can possibly do now?

Mr. RAKER. No.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I will not occupy your time a minute. I merely want to say that Members of Congress should not be given privileges not extended to everybody else. Surely this provision in the bill should be eliminated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, there is a gross misconception as to how this bill will work out. It is for the benefit of the employees of the Government in the District of Columbia, whereby they will be permitted to purchase supplies of the commissary, and exactly the same quantity of goods will come into the District of Columbia, but less of it will come into the hands of the local grocers. More of it will go to the commissary. The Government employees can go to the commissary and purchase at a lesser price than they can purchase of the local grocer. God knows they ought to have the right to do it. I wish the House would remember this one thing, that exactly the same quantity of supplies will come into the District of Columbia to be dealt out among the various employees here. They are now buying from the local grocer, and under this they will purchase of the commissary. The officers of the Army and the Navy who are getting big salaries can buy from the commissary at cost. The United States does not lose one penny by this, and I ask why in the name of common sense a man who is paid less for his work should not have the same privilege?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] showed his temper a little while ago about this legislation and what it results in by moving to strike out the following words, "Who reside in the District of Columbia," so that it would read, if that had been done—

That all officers and employees of the United States shall be permitted to purchase supplies from such commissary stores.

That is what the gentleman desires, but he saw as soon as the House understood it that there was trouble in the air, and he had unanimous consent to withdraw it.

Now, let us see. We are having trouble drafting people to go into the Army. We are commissioning men for the commissary service in the Army and the Navy and appropriating one billion, two billions, and it is said five billions toward financing our allies. We are increasing the salaries of the clerks and others that ought to have been increased in the District of Columbia. Do not you think that it is well enough, with our advances to the allies, with our friend Hoover and his followers and everybody else making regulations, saying what we shall eat and what we shall sell and what we shall produce, issuing licenses—do not you think it is well for us to go a little slower? Good God, let us do the necessary things to win this war and let these employees, who will never smell gunpowder and who are having their salaries increased, in the Postal Service and elsewhere—let us increase the salaries again, if necessary, but let us keep away from socialism in time of war. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate on the motion has been exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read the rule:

When general debate is closed by order of the House, any Member shall be allowed five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which the Member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate thereon.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the debate has been almost entirely confined to those opposing the bill, except the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has alternated in recognition, and the Chair recalls distinctly that there were two gentlemen recognized who favored the amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order on a motion to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman from Missouri say to that point of order?

Mr. BORLAND. I move that the motion to strike out the enacting clause be laid on the table.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion can not be made in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order in Committee of the Whole. The Chair thinks if the point of order is made and insisted upon, clearly under the rule debate has been exhausted.

Mr. BORLAND. I think the point of order is well taken, but I hope the gentleman will not insist upon it. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] that the committee recommend that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

PATROL DRIVERS, METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 9784) incorporating patrol drivers into the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman calls up the bill H. R. 9784, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the patrol drivers in the employment of the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia are hereby declared to be members of the Metropolitan Police Department force of the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WHEELER].

The CHAIRMAN. How much time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. All of the rest of the time, except that reserved by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY], so that that would leave the gentleman nine minutes.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to take up any time of the House. It is a very simple bill, and simply classifies the patrol drivers as patrolmen. Patrol drivers today are not entitled to any of the benefits of the pension act which was passed in the last Congress. If they are classified as patrolmen they will come under the benefits of that act. There are about 22 patrol drivers, and they are sworn officers when called upon to do duties of a patrolman. They work a great many hours more than the patrolmen do. Some of them have been in the service for over 25 years, and all of them for the past 15 years, at least. If they should become crippled or in any way disqualified on account of physical disability they will not be able, as the law now stands, to obtain any of the benefits of the pension act.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. COX. Will this increase their salaries?

Mr. WHEELER. Probably $10 a month.

Mr. COX. I am glad of that.

Mr. WHEELER. I think their salary is about $90, and this will increase it about $10. But that is not the object of the bill. It is to bring them under the provisions of the pension act which was passed at the last session of the last Congress.

Mr. McKENZIE. And this gives the patrol drivers the same status as other members of the police force?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does this bill meet with the approval of the police organization in the city?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; as I understand it. It is unanimously reported favorably from the committee. If these men should become disqualified by physical disabilities, as I said before, so that they could not perform their duties, they would receive none of the benefits of this pension act.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Of course the gentleman understands that when patrol drivers get the status of policemen they get the longevity pay, which they do not get now, which would vastly increase after a few years the compensation given them. The gentleman also knows that the examination which must be taken by a policeman to be able to become a member of the police force is perhaps the most rigid of all the examinations as to physical qualifications, and that is especially interesting to the police on account of the distribution of the fund which is in the nature of a pension to them. Have the policemen themselves, who have contributed for a number of years to this fund, been consulted about putting all of the patrol drivers on the same basis as they?

Mr. WHEELER. I can not say as to that. I know that some of the employees of the fire department have said that this was a just measure and should be passed; and I also know, and so does the gentleman, that the patrol drivers put in far more time than do the patrolmen themselves. For example, every other Sunday they are on duty 24 hours. They have two shifts, while the patrolmen have three shifts.

Mr. SISSON. I understand; but the other feature of the matter was one that I was anxious to know about—whether the committee had thrashed out the matter. The benefits to which they will be entitled under the law, if it passes, have for a number of years been contributed by the policemen and firemen out of their salaries. The Government finally took charge of it, and it has charge now of the administration of that fund. Since we take the fund, it is in the nature of a trust fund for the benefit of the policemen and the firemen.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Is it not a fact that these patrol drivers are sworn in as officers and have the power to make arrests?

Mr. SISSON. That is true.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. In other words, they can be called upon by the chief at any time to go out and make an arrest?

Mr. SISSON. I am not raising that question. I am raising this question, that the physical qualifications of a man to be a patrol driver are entirely different from the requirements for a patrolman, as to health, and so forth, and if he should become a pensioner on that fund you may put a burden upon these policemen which they ought not to bear. I was simply asking if the policemen themselves and the firemen themselves, who have to stand also an examination, are agreed to this.

Mr. WHEELER. There are a number of patrol drivers that have been in the service longer than the patrolmen have to-day.

Mr. SISSON. That is true, that may be true.

Mr. WHEELER. And on account of old age, they will be displaced in a few years.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think the gentleman understood the point of my inquiry. It was for the purpose of ascertaining whether as a matter of equity you are putting a burden upon the policemen and firemen——

Mr. WHEELER. I think not.

Mr. SISSON. That they ought not to bear.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the patrol drivers in the employment of the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia are hereby declared to be members of the Metropolitan Police Department force of the District of Columbia.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman from Illinois know what additional expense that will place upon the Treasury—how much additional salary will be the total amount?

Mr. WHEELER. I should say $10 a month for the patrol drivers—and I think there are about 22—that will be $220 a month.

Mr. SISSON. I am inclined to believe the gentleman perhaps states a little too low what the expense will be. I thought perhaps he had the information.

Mr. WHEELER. I think that is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA FIRE DEPARTMENT—TWO-PLATOON SYSTEM.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 11231) to regulate the hours of duty of the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SISSON. I understand this bill is to be taken up under the five-minute rule and will be discussed by sections. There are several sections in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair takes that for granted, but he has not looked at it.

Mr. SISSON. It is not a very long bill, and I addressed the Chair at the close of the first section.

Mr. Chairman, I want to state I have absolutely no objection to the two-platoon system——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise? The bill has not reached consideration under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SISSON. Have not we dispensed with the first reading of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not been done.

Mr. SISSON. Then I ask unanimous consent, to save time, to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, as I have said, I have absolutely no objection to the two-platoon system, but I do have objection to arbitrarily in the law divide the firemen into two classes. I think it ought to be left as a matter of administration. Nor do I have any objection to its becoming permanent law, but the two-platoon system ought to be so liberal that the city officials administering the law would not be bound ironclad to two platoons. For instance, some cities have shifts of 8, 12, and 16 hours each. Now, the matter was before a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, but I do not think really that the law is absolutely necessary, because I think it can be accomplished by increasing the number of firemen, and I will state the subcommittee, of which I am chairman, has reported and the full committee will report favorably an increase in the number of firemen to install the two-platoon system. Now, that can be done in several ways. In some cities they have 8, 10, and 16. The District Commissioners want to try out the 10 and 14 so that under this provision a fireman will be on duty 10 hours and off duty 14 hours. Then the other half of the time firemen would be on duty 14 hours and off 10 hours. Now, if this system does not work well the administration ought to have latitude enough to adopt, if they desire to do so, some different hours, for example, 8, 12, or 16. Any time that does not keep the fireman on duty a shorter time than 8 hours or longer than 16 has been the general rule that has prevailed throughout the country. I will say that the subcommittee went into this matter with some degree of care. For that reason I do object to that clause; I do not object to the law, but I would rather leave that more largely to the administration——

Mr. MADDEN. In other words, the gentleman from Mississippi, if I may be allowed, wishes to leave it discretionary with the chief of the fire department as to the hours of duty which the men should work, 8, 10, or what not?

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. I would ask for five minutes more, because I shall say all I want to say during that time, and I perhaps will not consume all of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SISSON. I do seriously object at the very outset to tying the hands of the District Commissioners so that they will be compelled arbitrarily to adopt the 10 and 14 hour system. Now, the words "two-platoon" system would perhaps carry or convey the idea that that is what it means, but it does not necessarily mean that.

Mr. VAN DYKE. In the first section of the bill it says, "which shall be designated as a day force and a night force."

Mr. SISSON. That is all right, I do not object to that in the shifting of the day force and the night force if we were to leave it discretionally with the administration to determine whether they should have them divided into three divisions——

Mr. VAN DYKE. Two divisions.

Mr. SISSON. That is generally what is meant by the two-platoon system, and we went into the matter with some degree of care in the Committee on Appropriations. I do not believe the law is necessary to install it at all. I think the only thing necessary to do is to give the District Commissioners the number of firemen necessary to install that system. Now, you talk to some firemen about it and they will tell you that frequently they would rather have an eight-hour shift to-day so that they might have 16 hours at some other time, therefore the details of it can be worked out by administration. They never let a man work less than 8 hours except for special reasons and never force him to stay at the engine house longer than 16 hours, so some cities have 8, 12, and 16, so it is suggested by the addition of about a third, or 33⅓ per cent, to the number of firemen the fireman has an opportunity to remain with his family at least 8 hours a day.

Mr. VAN DYKE. Would you have any objection to so changing the first section that it would provide for two platoons, but that the two platoons should either be in the 16 or 8, 14 and 10, or 12 and 12? What I object to is three shifts during the day. That brings one man 16 hours a day.

Mr. SISSON. If you go far enough into it it may be that this man, for a certain time, through the chief of the fire department, might for a special reason desire to have 16 hours off. It simply gives more latitude, and I think makes it more serviceable to the men and more serviceable to good administration. I have no objection to the two-platoon system being installed, because you are always going to have practically the same number of men on duty all the time.

Mr. VAN DYKE. Providing for a day and night force?

Mr. SISSON. I do not object to that at all. I think our committee agreed unanimously that the so-called two-platoon system was a matter of humanity as well as of getting more efficient service out of the fire department.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. MASON. The two-platoon system is the system which has worked so successfully in the city of Chicago, and I can not yet gather from what the gentleman has said—and perhaps it is my fault and probably is—in what way we could improve this.

Mr. SISSON. Because the law arbitrarily says there shall be only two divisions of them—the day and night shifts—working 10 hours and 14 hours. You see you absolutely crystallize it, and take from the commissioners and the fire department all discretion as to any other change in the hours that the men shall work.

Mr. MASON. I will say to the gentleman that, as I understand it, this two-platoon system, as applied in the cities of Minneapolis, St. Paul, and Chicago, has worked very satisfactorily.

Mr. SISSON. I do not believe the gentleman was here when I began my remarks. The subcommittee on appropriations——

Mr. MASON. Yes; I heard them.

Mr. SISSON (continuing). Having charge of appropriating money, were convinced, as is the District Committee, that the two-platoon system is right and ought to be installed in the District of Columbia. But the only difference between my position and that taken by the committee is that I thought, as a matter of administration, they ought to have more leeway in fixing hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] has again expired. The Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the hours of duty of the day force shall be 10 hours; the hours of the night force shall be 14 hours: Provided, That once or more every two weeks, for the purpose of alternating the day force with the night force, and vice versa, the number of hours of duty herein stated may be exceeded: Provided further, That one force shall be at liberty at all times except as otherwise provided in section 4 of this act.

Mr. SISSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think we can perhaps agree so as to leave it in the discretion of the District Commissioners to fix the hours, provided they have the two shifts—the day shift and the night shift. I think we can perhaps agree on an amendment that might cure the condition. And I will say to the Chair that this morning is the first time I have seen the bill——

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman is taking that up, may I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the two-platoon system?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Now, as to section 2, on the first page of the bill, I think if you will strike out the whole section it will leave it then absolutely within the discretion of the District Commissioners to fix those hours. You see the day force and the night force will alternate.

Mr. VAN DYKE. I wish to bring the gentleman's attention to line 4, where it says "that one force shall be at liberty at all times." That is an important part of the bill.

Mr. SISSON. My attention had not been called to that. I have no objection to that clause, except that in the event of a disastrous fire——

Mr. VAN DYKE. That is provided for in section 4.

Mr. MASON. That is provided for.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move we amend by striking out all of section 2, beginning on line 10, page 1, with the words "That the hours of duty," down to and including the words "Provided further," which occur on line 4, page 2, so that section 2 shall read:

That one force shall be at liberty at all times, except as otherwise provided in section 4 of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SISSON: On page 1, line 10, after the figure "2," strike out all the language down to and including the word "further," on page 2, line 4, so that section 2 will read:

"That one force shall be at liberty at all times, except as otherwise provided in section 4 of this act."

Mr. VAN DYKE. Mr. Chairman, I agree to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are directed to appoint a sufficient number of men and officers in addition to the existing force to carry out the objects of this act.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question. How many additional firemen will this two-platoon organization require to be employed in the District of Columbia?

Mr. VAN DYKE. About 30 per cent.

Mr. SISSON. I can give you the exact figures. It will take 144 additional firemen and two additional officers. You understand that they have got all the force now on two shifts; that is, the officers; so by adding, practically, as the gentleman says, 30 per cent it will be 144 new firemen. It may seem strange to gentlemen that——

Mr. ROBBINS. Does not that seem like an enormous increase in the number of firemen?

Mr. SISSON. Not when you remember that you have in the neighborhood of 400 firemen in the service now. Every fireman has 3 hours off each day and is on duty 21 hours. He then has every fifth day and a half off. Therefore by catching up the three hours a day on each fireman, catching up the 24 hours and a little more each day in the week, and catching up half a day, it will amount to such a number of hours as that when you divide it into two forces it is only necessary that you keep one less fireman on duty than under the present system, and that fireman can be placed in the day shift instead of the night shift. In other words, I was very much surprised when I worked it out to find out that you can get two forces, one at night and one in the day, by adding 30 per cent.

Mr. ROBBINS. Right along that line, I do not see in the report of the committee any indication of how the firemen regard this and how the Commissioners of the District of Columbia regard this bill. Has it been submitted to them?

Mr. SISSON. They favor it.

Mr. VAN DYKE. It should be remembered that we are building millions of dollars' worth of additional buildings in the District of Columbia, and it will take more firemen to protect those buildings.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am simply seeking information, not being on the District Committee. But it strikes me that the first persons to be consulted about this would be the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the firemen. They have not expressed any approval, have they?

Mr. SISSON. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia were heard before our committee, and they were a unit in favor of it, and all the firemen were a unit on it. I was surprised at the situation when it was presented in the committee. Nearly all cities that have an up-to-date system have the two-platoon system. I was amazed when I found that many of these firemen for practically a week would never be able to see their families. They would live at some distance from the fire-engine house and be away for practically five days without being home.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am not opposed to this bill, but there is one other question that I would like to ask. How much additional cost to the District of Columbia will this be, either by the month or by the year, if this is put in force?

Mr. SISSON. I could tell exactly if I had before me the hearings of the Committee on Appropriations. It will cost in a year $150,000. My recollection is that it will cost about $158,400.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the commissioners are all in favor of this bill. They are in favor of the two-platoon system.

Mr. ROBBINS. I withdraw the pro forma amendment, Mr. Chairman. I have obtained the information I desired.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall not act as a repeal of any act or acts, or part or parts of any act or acts, and shall not annul, modify, or affect any city ordinance, or part or parts thereof, relating to the salaries, annual leave or vacation, sick or disability leave of absence of the officers and members of the fire-fighting force of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. CROSSER. Just for one minute, to urge the passage of the bill. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARY. I make the same request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 17, after the word "that," insert the words "except as herein provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN DYKE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill as amended be laid aside with favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the bill as amended be laid aside with favorable recommendation. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

PROBATION SYSTEM IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill H. R. 10891.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10891) to amend and reenact an act for the establishment of a probation system for the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That an act for the establishment of a probation system for the District of Columbia, approved June 25, 1910, be amended and reenacted by striking out of section 1 of said act the following words: "and one assistant probation officer at a salary of $1,200 per annum," and in lieu thereof insert the following: "and two assistant probation officers at a salary of $1,200 each, and one stenographer and typist at a salary of $1,200 per annum," so that said section 1 of said act when so amended shall read:

"That the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia in general term may appoint one probation officer, at a salary of $1,800 per annum, and as many volunteer assistant probation officers, male or female, as occasion may require; and that the police court of the District of Columbia may appoint one chief probation officer, at a salary of $1,500 per annum, and two assistant probation officers, at a salary of $1,200 each, and one stenographer and typist, at a salary of $1,200 per annum, and as many volunteer assistant probation officers, male or female, as occasion may require.

"All such probation officers and assistants shall be appointed for a term of two years, and may be removed by the respective courts appointing them. All such volunteer probation officers shall serve without compensation, and shall have such powers and perform such duties as may be assigned to them by said courts."

That section 5 of said act be amended by striking out of said section the words "five thousand dollars" and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "eight thousand dollars," so that said section when so amended shall read:

"SEC. 5. That the chief probation officer of each court shall be entitled, for himself and his assistants, to a room in the building occupied by that court, and all necessary stationery and supplies for the transaction of the business of his office; and all the probation officers except volunteer officers shall be entitled to their necessary expenses in performing the duties of their office, under the direction of the court, the amount of the expense for such stationery, supplies, and expenses to be fixed and allowed by the court upon proper vouchers submitted to it by the probation officers, and accounts duly verified by their oaths; and for the purpose of this act there is hereby appropriated the sum of $8,000, one half to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CRISP). The gentleman from Colorado moves that the bill be laid aside with favorable recommendation. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

SPUR TRACK ACROSS FIRST STREET NE.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill S. 3476.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3476) to authorize the extension of a spur track or siding from the existing lines of railroad in the District of Columbia across First Street NE., between L and M Streets, to the buildings occupied by the field medical supply depot of the Army.

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby granted the Surgeon General of the United States Army to construct, maintain, and operate a temporary single-track overhead siding across First Street NE., between L and M Streets, to the building or buildings in square 675, occupied by the field medical supply depot of the Army: Provided, That the siding herein authorized shall not extend westwardly beyond a point 569 feet and 9 inches east of the present site of Sibley Hospital or any of its buildings, and shall be limited to the use of the Medical Department of the United States Army; and within six months following the declaration of peace the Surgeon General shall cause said side track to be entirely removed from the limits of said street and shall cause the aforesaid street to be restored to its condition prior to the construction of the siding without cost to the District of Columbia.

The Surgeon General of the Army shall provide for the construction, maintenance, and removal of this siding as herein authorized and prescribed, and the costs thereof shall be defrayed from the appropriations for the Medical and Hospital Department of the United States Army: Provided further, That said track shall be used only between the hours of 6 o'clock a. m. and 9 o'clock p. m. except in cases of extreme emergency, and trains shall be operated with the least possible noise.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, this is the Senate bill that has been asked for, as stated before by me, by the Surgeon General, for the purpose of extending a spur track to the medical supply depot. Hearings were had in the Senate, and the bill was reported and passed unanimously.

The objection made to it was made by some officers of a very worthy institution known as a hospital, because they feared it would be a permanent fixture there; and so the House committee, in order to remove any question as to permanency, recommended the amendment, as shown in the report, that it should be used simply during the war and 30 days thereafter.

Now, this amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILLIARD] was recommended in the House committee and should be offered as a committee amendment, as I understand it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I just came in. It may be that the necessity of the bill was explained before, but I did not hear it.

Mr. MASON. Yes. It is an urgent necessity. It really ought to have been passed at once. The Government of the United States has a supply depot for all of the medical and surgical supplies that are received here for distribution throughout the country. The estimated loss is several hundred dollars a day to the Government. They are paying $300 for drayage a day, and that could be saved if this track were extended over the street. In addition to that, in addition to the saving of the money, there is a necessity of having quick distribution of the medical supplies that are sent here. Then they are divided up and distributed among the different hospitals and cantonments.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. How close does it go to this hospital?

Mr. MASON. The committee were unanimous in the opinion that it did not injure the hospital at all. We had hearings upon that, and there was no evidence either before the Senate committee or before the House committee that it would in any way interfere with the hospital.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I will ask the gentleman if this is a proposition to lay a spur track so that they can run the supplies right to the supply depot without having to cart them at all?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. So that they can run them there in the railroad cars?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. This supply depot is sending carloads of supplies every week to European hospitals, is it not?

Mr. MASON. Yes; the Surgeon General himself came and urged the immediate passage of this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will ask the gentleman whether or not subsequent to these hearings the governors of this hospital withdrew their objection?

Mr. MASON. I do not understand that they have formally withdrawn their objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the committee are satisfied that it will be of no real injury to the hospital?

Mr. MASON. Yes; it is clearly of no possible damage to the hospital; but for fear it might be we provided that it should continue only during the war.

Mr. FESS. As I understand there has been an investigation made, very largely in the interest of the hospital, to ascertain whether it would interfere with the hospital, and that a report has been made that it will not seriously interfere.

Mr. MASON. That is right.

Mr. FESS. However, I understand that the governors of the hospital have not withdrawn their objection.

Mr. MASON. I do not understand that they have withdrawn their objection. I did understand that their main objection was for fear that it might be a permanent improvement there.

Mr. FESS. I will say that I have had an unusual number of protests, coming, as is usually the case, from persons who have been written to, and who have been asked to protest against this particular movement, and I was interested to ascertain the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to say to him that from my own investigation I am satisfied in my own mind that we ought to offer this measure of relief, and I shall therefore vote for the bill, although I would have hesitated to do so if you had not put this limitation in the bill, because I am greatly interested in seeing that property retain its value.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I have received a great many protests against this proposed siding in by this hospital, stating that the hospital has been an institution there for 30 years, and that there is no necessity of the Government establishing a warehouse right up near to it and then running a railroad siding in by the hospital to the warehouse.

Mr. MASON. It does not run by it. If the gentleman had visited the location, or had seen a photograph as we have, he would not pay one moment's attention to that. It can not possibly interfere with the hospital, and we want to distribute the medicines promptly to the soldiers here and elsewhere.

Mr. ROBBINS. Was it necessary to establish the warehouse in that particular place?

Mr. MASON. The warehouse depot was rented, and it was stated before the committee that it is the only available place which the Surgeon General could secure for it at that time.

Mr. ROBBINS. These protests have come to me, and I am seeking information. The protests came to me in this form, that this Lucy Webb Hayes Hospital, established as a memorial to Mrs. Hayes, wife of a former President, some 30 years ago, was in a suitable neighborhood, properly located, properly cared for, and the United States came in and without any very great reason established a supply depot right alongside of it.

Mr. MASON. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. ROBBINS. And now seeks to run this railroad right in by it.

Mr. MASON. I wish I had the photograph. If the gentleman would take the time to read the report which I have made——

Mr. ROBBINS. I have read the report on this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me? I think I may be able——

Mr. ROBBINS. I merely want to be sure about this. Many of my constituents have protested earnestly against this proposition.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I would like to say that I have also had a number of protests, among them one from a prominent Methodist minister of my district, and to him I made a full statement of the conditions, of the bill in its present form, and of the existing circumstances. He submitted that statement to a board of his church, and thereupon he wrote to me stating that in view of present conditions they did not press further opposition. I ask unanimous consent to incorporate his letter in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

FIRST METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH,
EAST DETROIT DISTRICT,
Romeo, Mich., April 3, 1918.

Representative L. C. CRAMTON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your communications regarding the matter of extension of the railroad approaching the Sibley Hospital.

I submitted the correspondence to the conference board of the Woman's Home Missionary Society, who are especially interested in the case. They went carefully over the whole matter and are satisfied that the best that can be done has been done, and they direct me to convey to you their sincere and hearty appreciation and thanks for your interest in the matter.

To this permit me to add my personal thanks.

* * * * * * *

Cordially,

W. M. WARD.

Mr. LITTLE. May I have the attention of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. Can the gentleman indicate what change has been made in this bill that would make a change in the opinion of the gentleman to whom he refers? A very distinguished Methodist bishop has written me in accordance with the objections which have been expressed here. Now, if there has been some change made in the bill, I would like to know what it is.

Mr. MASON. The Senate bill provided that the track could be used only during the period of the war and for six months after, and that then the track should be taken up. In order to satisfy the wish of the reverend gentlemen who appeared before us the committee reduced that time by putting in an amendment saying that it could only be used for 30 days after the war. We supposed that was satisfactory; that they were patriotic and wanted to help us get the medicine to the soldiers; and we have heard nothing further from it. All of this propaganda of protest was made before the Senate passed the bill. As soon as it came to us we had the facts investigated. We had before the committee the health officers and prominent physicians and the heads of medical institutions of the city of Washington, and they said that it could not in any possible way injure this hospital.

Mr. LITTLE. Do I understand that some of the preachers interested in this have been satisfied by the committee that the present bill contains nothing for them to criticize?

Mr. MASON. I do not make such a statement, because I do not know. One stated that if they could be assured that it would not be a permanent thing, but simply a war measure to help the Government to distribute medical supplies, they would not object. Ever since the amendment known as the Hilliard amendment has been agreed to I have heard nothing further.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I understood the gentleman to say that this is only a war measure.

Mr. MASON. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. And the track will be taken up in 30 days after peace is declared.

Mr. MASON. No one can use it after peace is declared, and the tracks will be taken up in 30 days.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the putting in of these tracks constitute a nuisance to the patients in the hospital?

Mr. MASON. No; if it would, I would ask that the Government move its warehouses. There has not been a single member of the committee who has visited the place or a single health officer from the city of Washington but what says that it would not interfere with the hospital.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit? There are important reasons why this bill should be laid aside at this time, and I will ask the gentleman to withhold that request for the time being.

Mr. MASON. I would like to have this amendment adopted, and then the committee can order a favorable report upon the bill and we will be through.

Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment. On page 2, line 3, after the word "Army," insert the words "and for the period preceding the declaration of peace and 30 days thereafter." This is a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "Army," insert the following: "and for the period preceding the declaration of peace and 30 days thereafter."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the committee should now rise and the House should proceed with other business, requiring probably 30 or 40 minutes, and the House should again resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District matters, would this be the first business taken up?

The CHAIRMAN. When the District of Columbia business is again resumed this would be the unfinished business and the first in order.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this will take two minutes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the word "and" in the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois should be stricken from his amendment.

Mr. MASON. That is correct, and I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by striking out the first word, "and."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, after the word "Army," insert the following: "for the period preceding the declaration of peace and 30 days thereafter."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MASON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill as amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills under consideration to which amendments have been adopted, and those without amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills, and had directed him to report back bill H. R. 10894, with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken from the bill; that bills H. R. 9784 and 10891 be passed without amendment; that the bill H. R. 11231 be passed with an amendment, and the bill S. 3476 be passed with an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bills and amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the bill (H. R. 10894) permitting certain persons to purchase supplies from the commissary stores of the Army and Navy, striking out the enacting clause.

The question was taken, and the enacting clause was stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill (H. R. 9784) incorporating patrol drivers into the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The next question is on the amendment to the bill (H. R. 11231) to regulate the hours of duty of the officers and members of the fire department of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The next question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill (H. R. 10891) to amend and reenact an act for the establishment of a probation system for the District of Columbia.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The next question is on the amendment to the bill (S. 3476) to authorize the extension of a spur track or siding from the existing lines of railroad in the District of Columbia across First Street NE., between L and M Streets, to the buildings occupied by the Field Medical Supply Depot of the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. My Speaker, I move that the several votes by which the bills were passed be reconsidered and that that motion lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

SILVER COINAGE (H. REPT. NO. 505).

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 317.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to the consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole of Senate bill 4292 as the same passed the Senate. The Clerk shall read the said bill as the same passed the Senate, and at the conclusion of such reading the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the same to final passage, without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4292) to conserve the gold supply of the United States; to permit the settlement in silver of trade balances adverse to the United States; to provide silver for subsidiary coinage and for commercial use; to assist foreign governments at war with the enemies of the United States; and for the above purposes to stabilize the price and encourage the production of silver.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized from time to time to melt or break up and to sell as bullion not in excess of 350,000,000 standard silver dollars now or hereafter held in the Treasury of the United States. Any silver certificates which may be outstanding against such standard silver dollars so melted or broken up shall be retired at the rate of $1 face amount of such certificates for each standard silver dollar so melted or broken up. Sales of such bullion shall be made at such prices not less than $1 per ounce of silver 1,000 fine and upon such terms as shall be established from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 2. That upon every such sale of bullion from time to time the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately direct the Director of the Mint to purchase in the United States, of the product of mines situated in the United States, and of reduction works so located, an amount of silver equal to 371.25 grains of pure silver in respect of every standard silver dollar so melted or broken up and sold as bullion. Such purchases shall be made in accordance with the then existing regulations of the mint and at the fixed price of $1 per ounce of silver 1,000 fine, delivered at the option of the Director of the Mint at New York, Philadelphia, Denver, or San Francisco. Such silver so purchased may be resold for any of the purposes hereinafter specified in section 3 of this act, under rules and regulations to be established by the Secretary of the Treasury, and any excess of such silver so purchased over and above the requirements for such purposes shall be coined into standard silver dollars or held for the purpose of such coinage, and silver certificates shall be issued to the amount of such coinage. The net amount of silver so purchased, after making allowance for all resales, shall not exceed at any one time the amount needed to coin an aggregate number of standard silver dollars equal to the aggregate number of standard silver dollars theretofore melted or broken up and sold as bullion under the provisions of this act, but such purchases of silver shall continue until the net amount of silver so purchased, after making allowance for all resales, shall be sufficient to coin therefrom an aggregate number of standard silver dollars equal to the aggregate number of standard silver dollars theretofore so melted or broken up and sold as bullion.

SEC. 3. That sales of silver bullion under authority of this act may be made for the purpose of conserving the existing stock of gold in the United States, of facilitating the settlement in silver of trade balances adverse to the United States, of providing silver for subsidiary coinage and for commercial use, and of assisting foreign governments at war with the enemies of the United States. The allocation of any silver to the Director of the Mint for subsidiary coinage shall, for the purposes of this act, be regarded as a sale or resale.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to reimburse the Treasurer of the United States for the difference between the nominal or face value of all standard silver dollars so melted or broken up and the value of the silver bullion, at $1 per ounce of silver 1,000 fine, resulting from the melting or breaking up of such standard silver dollars.

SEC. 5. That in order to prevent contraction of the currency, the Federal reserve banks may be either permitted or required by the Federal Reserve Board, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, to issue Federal reserve bank notes, in any denominations (including denominations of $1 and $2) authorized by the Federal Reserve Board, in an aggregate amount not exceeding the amount of standard silver dollars melted or broken up and sold as bullion under authority of this act, upon deposit as provided by law with the Treasurer of the United States as security therefor, of United States certificates of indebtedness, or of United States one-year gold notes. The Secretary of the Treasury may, at his option, extend the time of payment of any maturing United States certificates of indebtedness deposited as security for such Federal reserve bank notes for any period not exceeding one year at any one extension and may, at his option, pay such certificates of indebtedness prior to maturity, whether or not so extended. The deposit of United States certificates of indebtedness by Federal reserve banks as security for Federal reserve bank notes under authority of this act shall be deemed to constitute an agreement on the part of the Federal reserve bank making such deposit that the Secretary of the Treasury may so extend the time of payment of such certificates of indebtedness beyond the original maturity date or beyond any maturity date to which such certificates of indebtedness may have been extended, and that the Secretary of the Treasury may pay such certificates in advance of maturity, whether or not so extended.

SEC. 6. That as and when standard silver dollars shall be coined out of bullion purchased under authority of this act, the Federal reserve banks shall be required by the Federal Reserve Board to retire Federal reserve bank notes issued under authority of section 5 of this act, if then outstanding, in an amount equal to the amount of standard silver dollars so coined, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay off and cancel any United States certificates of indebtedness deposited as security for Federal reserve bank notes so retired.

SEC. 7. That the tax on any Federal reserve bank notes issued under authority of this act, secured by the deposit of United States certificates of indebtedness or United States one-year gold notes, shall be so adjusted that the net return on such certificates of indebtedness, or such one-year gold notes, calculated on the face value thereof, shall be equal to the net return on United States 2 per cent bonds, used to secure Federal reserve bank notes, after deducting the amount of the tax upon such Federal reserve bank notes so secured.

SEC. 8. That except as herein provided, Federal reserve bank notes issued under authority of this act shall be subject to all existing provisions of law relating to Federal reserve bank notes.

SEC. 9. That the provisions of Title VII of an act approved June 15, 1917, entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," and the powers conferred upon the President by subsection (b) of section 5 of an act approved October 6, 1917, known as the "trading-with-the-enemy act," shall, in so far as applicable to the exportation from or shipment from or taking out of the United States of silver coin or silver bullion, continue until the net amount of silver required by section 2 of this act shall have been purchased as therein provided.

At the conclusion of the reading of the first section of the bill,

Mr. MADDEN (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] whether it is intended——

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that the bill shall be read.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] have 10 minutes and that some gentleman upon the other side have 10 minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suggest that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] have 15 minutes and that the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] have 15 minutes.

Mr. POU. I accept the modification.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] have 15 minutes and the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] have 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the motion that I made to strike out the last word, in view of the provisions of the rule, would not now be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. MADDEN. I was simply going to ask the gentleman from Virginia to explain certain things in the bill.

Mr. GLASS. That is what I shall try to do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the bill ought to be read through under the rule.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, after the bill is read through is it subject to amendment in any section?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will conclude the reading of the bill.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to state his opinion about this rule. It is all clear except the provision that we shall proceed in the House as in Committee of the Whole. That means, undoubtedly, it would have to be read under the five-minute rule. The House has already granted 15 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES]. That seems to be in the nature of general debate. The Chair thinks it is the duty under the rule, after these gentlemen have used 30 minutes, to have the bill read for amendment under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, that was altogether foreign to the purpose of the Committee on Rules and to the understanding that I had with the committee when I asked for the rule.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, may I direct the Chair's attention to the fact that upon the completion of the reading of the bill, under the rule, the previous question shall be considered as ordered? If that be the effect of the rule, certainly amendments would not be in order after the previous question is ordered under the five-minute rule, because the rule further goes on to say that there shall be only one motion in order, and that a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I was called from the Chamber temporarily for a moment, but do I understand the Speaker to hold that under the rule the bill would have to be read for amendment under the five-minute rule?

Th SPEAKER. That is the rule that applies to proceedings in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the rules of the House be waived in this instance.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I may be in error about it, but I think that rule applies in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union but not when we are considering a bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes a suggestion that will clear it all up, and that is that consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule be waived. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I think the Chair is mistaken as to unanimous consent having been granted to the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from California to speak. I do not think the RECORD will show that the matter was actually submitted and allowed.

The SPEAKER. If there be an oversight in that respect the Chair will put the request again.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, it was the intention of the Committee on Rules when this rule was agreed to that the Chairman would move the previous question. That would leave 20 minutes on a side, to be divided among those who desired to discuss the bill, and upon the conclusion of that discussion the bill should be read and passed, the previous question being considered as ordered, thus avoiding the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule as suggested by the Speaker. After the rule was agreed to, and the bill taken up by direction of the Speaker and ordered read, it occurred to me that the debate agreed upon should be had, and it was for that reason that I suggested to the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Rules, that a request be preferred for unanimous consent for 30 minutes of debate, as indicated.

The SPEAKER. The way the matter stands, then, is that the gentleman from Illinois suggested, and the House adopted his suggestion, that debate under the five-minute rule be waived. Now, the Chair is reasonably certain that he put this 15-minute request, but in order to be certain he will put it again. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I find that there is no report accompanying this bill. I do not know how gentlemen in the House are informed about the bill——

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois there is a report, the original of which is at the desk, and a copy of which has been furnished the Public Printer, and he promised to have the printed report here by 3 o'clock.

Mr. CANNON. I am just taking for granted this bill is all right, having been passed by the Senate and being reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, and I have great confidence in the chairman and in that committee; but frankly I expect I have been busy about something else, and I declare I have not even read the bill.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. CANNON. I would like for a full explanation to be made, and if the 15 minutes is not enough let the gentleman proceed until he has fully explained the bill.

Mr. GLASS. I think perhaps I shall be able to explain it in less than 15 minutes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To ask if the gentleman objects to having the report read. He says it is at the Speaker's desk. It is a short report.

The SPEAKER. The printer has it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understood the report was here. If it is available, why not have it read. It may save a great deal of concern about the bill.

Mr. CANNON. I understand it has gone to the printer.

The SPEAKER. The report is in the hands of the printer and will be here in 10 minutes—the printed copy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is such an unusual proceeding and such an unusual bill——

Mr. GLASS. I think I can explain the bill in less time than it would require to read the report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] that they come in front of the Speaker's stand and explain what they have got to explain, so that Members can hear them, and if in the meantime the report arrives and it is desired to have it read it can be read.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman suggests the absence of a quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the point of no quorum, and the gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, when this measure was originally drawn some months ago it was designed to meet and overcome the difficulty that had arisen in our foreign-trade relations, involving a rather serious discrimination against this country in the matter of foreign exchange. Importers of many necessary articles were subject to great loss by reason of the depreciation of the American dollar in neutral countries in Europe and Asia, particularly in Spain and the Scandinavian nations as to Europe, and in the Orient, India and China. In that view it was not an emergency measure. It was confidently expected that the committee would have ample time to examine the questions involved, should it be thought desirable to consider the bill at all, and discuss them thoroughly. But within the last 10 days circumstances, of which I am not at liberty to speak in detail, have arisen which make action by Congress imperative. For that reason the bill, by unanimous action of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the other body, was presented to the Senate and, without division, passed. It was taken up for consideration on Friday and Saturday of last week by the House Committee on Banking and Currency and, at an exceptionally largely attended meeting, unanimously ordered to be reported to the House.

In our trade relations with the Orient, and particularly with India, we are put to the necessity of paying our balances in metal, and, on account of the large importations of jute, burlap, and other materials used in the handling and distribution of our crops, we are obliged to meet a large exchange balance, to our very great disadvantage. It shall be necessary for this country to ship to India, for the next ensuing 16 months at least, about $100,000,000 of gold to meet our importations, or otherwise to do what this bill proposes to do, borrow from the Treasury the only available stock of silver in the world at this time and ship it to India to meet trade balances. It is not necessary to say to the House that, gold being our primary money, every dollar of it that we shall export circumscribes our ability to meet the extraordinary commercial requirements of our own country at this time.

In short, if we do not pass this bill immediately we may be put to the necessity of shipping gold rather than silver to India. I transgress no propriety and reveal nothing that should not be disclosed to the House when I say that the governor of the Federal Reserve Board stated to the committee that the board had already felt obliged to give the large importers of jute, burlap, and other materials, which we are obliged to have, the assurance that if something of this sort should not be done immediately by Congress the Federal reserve banks would assure them the gold necessary to meet trade balances. The bill provides that there shall be a retirement, gradual or immediate, as circumstances may require, of $350,000,000 of outstanding silver certificates; and as those silver certificates are retired a like amount of the silver coin in the Treasury held as a cover for the silver certificates will be broken up and melted into silver bullion and sold by the Secretary of the Treasury to meet foreign exchange exigencies and to avert serious trouble in India. The Congress knows that India uses not exclusively, but almost exclusively, silver as its metallic currency. Any deficiency, if any, in the circulating medium that may be occasioned by the gradual or speedy retirement of $350,000,000 of silver certificates is to be met by the issuance, under authority of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board, of what is known as Federal reserve bank notes, based on short-time gold certificates and notes of the United States.

When the emergency shall have passed or the war ended, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to purchase an equivalent amount of silver to that which may be utilized in this transaction to replace the silver thus loaned to the British Government and used for foreign exchange purposes by the recoinage of a like amount of silver dollars, upon which may be issued a like amount of silver certificates.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman have any objection to my asking a question right there?

Mr. GLASS. Not at all.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the interest rate charged on the rediscounts based on these certificates be sufficiently high to compensate the Government for the cost of recoinage?

Mr. GLASS. We think so. It is upon that theory that the bill is drawn.

Mr. MADDEN. And it is a higher rate than is usually charged on what we rediscount.

Mr. GLASS. That is true. There will be no trouble about the retirement of these Federal reserve bank notes when the emergency shall have passed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. I will.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The gentleman stated that there would be a trade balance of $100,000,000 in the next 16 months between this country and India. That accounts for $100,000,000. Why the other $250,000,000?

Mr. GLASS. The other $250,000,000 is to meet foreign exchange accounts with other countries and especially is to be used to counter an exigency that vitally affects our allies in the conduct of this war. Just in the degree that it vitally affects them it vitally affects us. I will read to the House a telegram that was sent to me from Deming, N. Mex., while I was absent from the city attending the funeral of my late colleague, Mr. JONES, by Secretary McAdoo, in which he says:

"A war emergency of the utmost urgency makes the prompt passage of the Pittman bill imperative. I commend this subject earnestly to the consideration of yourself and your associates on your committee. Will you please permit Assistant Secretary Leffingwell to lay before you my views about this matter?

"WILLIAM G. MCADOO,
"Secretary of the Treasury."

Upon my return I——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield before he leaves that point?

Mr. GLASS. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it is just as well to be frank with the House. We are considering the bill under a rule, as it comes from another body. During the discussion over there this was said:

I know that the situation in India is critical and that this bill is to relieve that situation. England must have more silver to meet her obligations to India, and India wants silver. There is only one great reserve of silver in the world to-day, and it is found in the Treasury of the United States, and that reservoir of silver must be opened and hastened to India in order to relieve the existing conditions.

Is that statement correct?

Mr. GLASS. That states the case in a nutshell. That statement, or a statement similar to that, was made by the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts, who spoke briefly to the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a situation affecting our allies at least equally with the United States?

Mr. GLASS. It is a situation we are obliged to meet. It is rather distressing to the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency to feel compelled to bring to the House a measure all of the details of which he is not at liberty to discuss fully and to ask the House upon its faith in him and his associates of the committee, acting as a unit, to accept the bill, but that is precisely the situation.

Upon my return to Washington on Saturday I found that the Committee on Banking and Currency had had a meeting and such hearings as were possible. In addition I personally made inquiry in every responsible quarter and satisfied myself that there was nothing else to do but to pass the Senate bill if we would avert trouble. To reassure the House even more fully, if I can, I present this letter, sent to me by the President under date of April 21:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 21, 1918.

Hon. CARTER GLASS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GLASS: I am taking the liberty of writing you to ask if the early report and passage of the silver bill will be possible. Circumstances have arisen which make the passage of this bill a genuine war emergency; otherwise I would not suggest so immediate action upon it. The circumstances, however, are pressing, and, I beg you to believe, justify me in making this request. I believe that you have been informed from the Treasury Department just what the exigency is.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOSTER). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman may have such further time as he and the House may desire in order to complete his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Virginia may have such time as he may desire in order to complete his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the House that I have no desire to proceed further. If I have not made the matter clear, I will be glad to answer any question that I can answer. But I do not desire to proceed any further with any general statement.

Mr. FOCHT. Before the gentleman retires, I would like to ask this question: It occurred to me when he was addressing the House and when he stated that this was for the relief of an ally, whether, rather than to deplete the Treasury of the silver reserve, it would not be possible for England to commandeer the jute in India, just as we commandeer any commodity in this country?

Mr. GLASS. My inquiry into the subject in all its aspects leads me to believe that this proposal is the only immediate remedy that may be applied to the situation.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances I should be opposing this bill very strenuously on several grounds. If the country were not in this war and the present emergency were not upon us, I should regard this bill as a piece of economic and financial folly.

There are several things in it that, if it were in my power, I would change. I would amend it radically, but from the information that has been conveyed to the members of the committee by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Federal Reserve Board, some of which information has been stated already by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], I conclude that this is not only an emergency measure but a matter of the greatest urgency. I therefore feel it to be my bounden duty to support it as it is, since under the rule just adopted it can not be amended.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. I will.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It comes to us rather suddenly here. I want to inquire if there is any evidence before your committee as to whether or not England knew of this exigency for some time and considered it before this was sprung on the United States?

Mr. HAYES. England has known for some time that she had out obligations, of course, but she was not familiar, and the world has not been made familiar, and is not now familiar, and it is not desirable that it should become familiar, with the dangers that lurk in the immediate future.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Did England take any steps to relieve this situation?

Mr. HAYES. Certainly; all the steps that were possible. As the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has stated, the United States has the only great supply of silver that is in the world.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I saw a statement in the paper this morning, and I think it would be fair that the gentleman should know of it, to the effect that in this transaction there is a speculation of over $70,000,000 by bankers of England. Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. HAYES. I know nothing about that. I want to say that under ordinary circumstances I should insist upon acting upon my own judgment and experience, after many years of study of financial questions; but under the present circumstances, when the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States comes to me and says, "The passage of this bill is a most vital war necessity," I sink my own judgment and my own feeling in the matter and yield to his urgent request as if it were a command. [Applause.] Although the circumstances surrounding this emergency have been quite fully explained to the members of the committee, many other things are doubtless known to the President that he is not at liberty to explain to the members of the committee; necessarily information must be open to him that he could not disclose to us.

I do not know that I care to discuss at any length the provisions of the bill. The gentleman from Virginia has explained them perhaps sufficiently. It is not intended by this measure to contract the currency at all. As fast as the silver is disposed of and the silver certificates withdrawn from circulation, other forms of currency will take their place. As fast as the Secretary of the Treasury can purchase the silver, he is not only authorized, but he is directed, to purchase and recoin and replace the silver which for the time being is taken out of the Treasury and sent abroad, so that this bill will not affect the volume of the currency nor the silver element in our currency permanently at all.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. I yield.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman says it will not affect the currency, the amount of money in circulation. What is to be placed back of the Federal reserve notes that are to be issued in place of the silver certificates when the silver is gone?

Mr. HAYES. United States certificates of indebtedness with a 5 per cent gold redemption fund, like the national bank currency.

Mr. GLASS. I may say to my colleague just at this point that we regard it as very much better to place United States gold certificates behind these Federal reserve banks than to place United States bonds behind them, because we wanted to avoid going back to the old system of a bond-secured currency.

Mr. HAYES. Of course, it amounts to the same thing.

Mr. GLASS. It does.

Mr. HAYES. But it is only a temporary expedient.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman state that the certificates may become due in one year?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; they are due in one year, but they may be extended under the terms of the bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Is all this amount to be placed to the credit of the United States?

Mr. HAYES. Is this amount to be placed to the credit of the United States? I do not know that I understand what the gentleman means.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The bill is advancing a credit of $350,000,000?

Mr. HAYES. Yes. The Government will own the silver, of course, as soon as the silver certificates are retired. The silver in the Treasury now is in the nature of a trust fund, owned by the owners of the certificates.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. When we ship this silver out how shall we get it back again?

Mr. HAYES. We shall not get it back.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We must get a credit. Are we getting an equal amount of credit for the silver?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. We sell the silver bullion?

Mr. HAYES. Yes. We sell the silver and use it largely to pay our debts. We are in the same condition as a man who owes Tom, Dick, and Harry, and has his chest full of silver and gold. He takes his choice as to whether he will pay in silver or gold. In this case we may pay either in silver or gold, and we prefer to pay in the former coin. Because it will enable us to hold on to our gold is one reason why I am willing to support this bill. If we do not use the silver we have in this emergency, we must part with some of our gold.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I notice that the purchases of silver are to be made according to existing regulations at the Mint and at the fixed price of $1 per ounce of silver. How is that price of $1 per ounce arrived at?

Mr. HAYES. Silver was worth in New York City on Saturday 96 cents and a fraction, and for some time it has fluctuated between 85 cents and $1 an ounce. We are selling it at the market price or a trifle above. Of course, the United States having put an embargo on the exportation of silver, the price will be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury so long as the embargo lasts, as he is the only large purchaser of silver in this country.

Mr. HUSTED. Your price remains absolutely fixed. But assume that the market value changes; you sell it at $1 an ounce, in spite of the market price?

Mr. HAYES. But the market price can not change in view of the situation created by the bill.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. I will remind my colleague that we sell it at least for a dollar, and that we buy it at a dollar, and so we lose nothing. And there is a provision in the export law so that no silver can be exported unless the President says so, so that we absolutely control the output of the mines of the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would like to ask a question about this bill. It is a very important matter. Silver is scarce. I see we are limited to the purchase of silver produced only in the United States. Why should we not purchase in South America, where we have large trade balances, and in Central America, and in Mexico, and British Columbia?

Mr. HAYES. Our silver mines produced 77,000,000 ounces last year. That is about one-half of the product of the world. We do not need to go outside this country, even if we dispose of all this $350,000,000. You can see readily that in a few years it can be all back again in the Treasury from the product of our own mines, and we want it to come from our own people.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAYES. I ought not to take any more time.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. In buying silver the merchantable price is 96?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Has the committee made any investigation of the amount of silver bullion in the individual ownership of citizens—speculators in silver bullion?

Mr. HAYES. We are advised that there is no considerable amount of that.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. None in private ownership?

Mr. HAYES. None to amount to anything. The demand has been great and the price unusually high for some time, and all these holdings are unloaded.

Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, this is a very extraordinary as well as a very grave and serious situation. We all of us in the House have become accustomed on both sides of the House to vote for the passage of bills which we totally disapproved of, because we were assured that they were necessary for the war.

But in nearly all cases until now we have at least had put before us some of the reasons of their necessity, and we have often surrendered our own judgment to the judgment of the Executive. But now a measure has come before us for which we are asked to vote because it is essential as a war measure, and yet the reasons are entirely withheld from us, so that this is a larger draft upon our confidence than has heretofore been made. But I feel for myself that despite that, inasmuch as this is an international question, we can not insist upon knowing the reasons, which we are told it is wise to withhold. Therefore, for one, I am content to ask no further questions and to accept the statement that there are reasons which can not be divulged to us which make it exigent and compulsory that this legislation pass, and so I am willing to vote for it. But I wish to say that one of the motives that constrains me to vote for a measure which seems to me fundamentally unsound, and which probably hardly anyone in this House approves of or wishes to vote for, is that I have great confidence in the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I suppose the chairman of that committee [Mr. GLASS] has been consulted by the President and facts have been imparted to him which it is not thought prudent to confide to the rest of us, and I believe that when the momentary exigency is past, and when it is possible to remedy the serious danger into which this legislation might plunge our whole banking system, the Banking and Currency Committee, under the leadership of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], will, as far as possible, make amends for this extraordinary step and bring us back into the path of safe banking. Therefore, for one, with much reluctance, but feeling that here as in previous cases we must yield to the wishes of the Executive and accepting the statement that it is unsafe to make public the information on which this legislation is based, regretting the necessity, I shall yet vote for the passage of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. HAYES. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I should be glad at any time to support sections 1, 3, and 4 of this bill, which I think are absolutely sound and could as well be passed in time of peace as in time of war. This silver that is piled up in the Treasury back of the silver certificates is not real basic money. It is about 20 per cent water, or fiat money, or paper money, or whatever you have in mind to call it. The silver certificates circulate on a gold basis by fiat of law, and so do the silver dollars themselves whenever anyone will take them. It is a good thing to be able to get rid of the silver, and get rid of it at a good price. We are selling it at a price which is larger than the price that silver has reached for a good while except in the case of fluctuations of the past year, and we are making it take the place of gold in foreign trade. We are selling it at a price that involves no loss to the country.

Now, the proposition that we have got to buy it back again and pile it up all over again is vicious and wrong, as is also the proposition to issue Federal reserve bank notes to take the place of the silver certificates as they are retired. The ostensible purpose of this is to prevent contraction; but there is no harm in a little contraction. I think it is pretty well understood, and I am going to say it plainly, that we are agreeing to these sections of the bill because it is necessary to act speedily and we have every reason to believe that we could not get the bill through the Senate, past the objections of the silverites in that body, without having them talk a couple of months, if we should cut out these objectionable sections. [Applause.]

I am willing to agree to speedy action on the assurance of the President that speedy action is necessary, but I want it made plain just why it is that such assurance needs to be given. This is a Senate bill and we are told to pass it just as it came from the Senate, because to amend it so as to make it sound would cause a dangerous delay. It is a plain case of holdup by the silverites, and I expect to do what I can, when the present emergency has passed, to see that the objectionable features shall be repealed.

Mr. HAYES. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in two minutes I can not go very far in a discussion of this measure. I do feel, however, that as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee some explanation should be made by me as well as by the other members of that committee. The facts have been pretty well stated in connection with this bill. I do not believe there is a member of this committee here who, under ordinary circumstances, would support this bill or who would support it now except for the fact of the extreme necessity for this special legislation, as pointed out by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Director of the Mint, and the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, all pleading for the immediate passage of this bill. In connection with this argument there is one point that has not been covered. I should like to mention that, and it is this, that this $350,000,000 of silver, which is now held by the Treasury of the United States, is a trust fund; that silver certificates are outstanding against that fund, and they must be redeemed before this coin can be released. There are now about $39,000,000 of these silver certificates held by the Treasury Department at this time, which, when this authority is given, will permit the cancellation of and the melting up of these silver dollars held as security for this amount. I hope the Treasury Department, in the administration of this law when it is passed, will be careful to see that none of the trust obligations are violated in the handling of this transaction. This sacred trust must not be violated under any circumstances.

In connection with the issuance of Federal reserve bank notes, a whole lot might be said that can not now be said in connection with this debate. When we passed the Federal reserve act we practically repudiated the bond-secured note-circulation proposition. In this instance we are going back to that in practically the same form by providing for the issue of Federal reserve notes by the 12 Federal reserve banks, secured by one-year temporary Treasury certificates, which are nothing more or less, in this instance, than a double promise to pay on the part of the United States. Why not issue United States notes direct and be honest with the people and not deceive them? In supporting this measure I am relying entirely upon the representations made by the administration officials that this is of the most pressing necessity to aid our allies to win the war. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time has expired. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. GLASS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent Mr. RAKER was given leave to revise and extend his remarks on House bill 10894.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I would not occupy the time of the House now except for the fact that the matter to which I wish to call attention is, to my mind, a matter of very great importance to the people of the country. That is the question of the Federal farm-loan bank and the manner in which the people's money, collected under the guise of war taxes, is being loaned throughout the country. I believe it is a matter of greater importance than the average citizen has any good conception of.

I have given this question considerable thought, and I am not a crank on this subject. At this time, when the people of the country are being called upon to contribute to the Federal Government in aid of carrying on this great war, I believe that it is a great mistake to squander money so collected from the people in loaning money in a manner entirely, in my opinion, different from that expected when the Congress of the United States passed that law. I am in receipt of a letter from a member of the Farm Loan Commission, Mr. George W. Norris. I made a statement on the floor of the House not long ago and said that I knew of a piece of land that had been sold less than five years ago at $3 an acre. To make it clear to you, I sold the land myself. I own the adjoining 80 acres, that I now offer for sale at $5 an acre, and get no purchaser. Not long ago the man to whom I had contracted that land wrote me and wanted a deed for the land, and stated that he was getting a loan from the Federal Government at $15 an acre, no improvements on the land, and he wanted me to recommend the loan. I declined to do so.

Commissioner Norris wrote and asked me to give him the particulars. I answered Mr. Norris, saying I sold the land in question, but that I had rather not give the information requested, and asked the gentleman's pardon for declining to give the information. It is not my place to look after the Federal farm loans. I am not a member of any board that has control of those loans. I do not know whether the man succeeded in getting the loan or not, but he wrote me saying he was getting it and wanted me to recommend it. If the loan was made the land has been sold to the Federal Government, for nobody will pay that price—$15 per acre—for it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman will be brief, for my time is limited and I have much to say.

Mr. MADDEN. What was the amount of the loan that the gentleman says the Farm Loan Board made on the land?

Mr. FORDNEY. The man wrote me that he was obtaining a loan of $15 an acre.

Mr. MADDEN. How much did he pay?

Mr. FORDNEY. Three dollars per acre.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the idea of the gentleman as to what this land is worth?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am offering the adjoining 80 acres at $5 an acre, with no purchaser.

Mr. MADDEN. Why does not the gentleman offer it to the Farm Loan Board for $15 an acre?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have nothing to offer the Farm Loan Board but criticism. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman knows that the application of $15 an acre was not approved by the farm-loan bank.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not; the owner said he was getting the money, and asked me to give him a recommendation.

Mr. WINGO. Does not the gentleman know that the farm-loan bank does not undertake to pass on an application until the perfected title papers come in, and, as the gentleman says, he refused to make the recommendation, no perfect-title papers have been presented to the bank.

Mr. FORDNEY. When I gave the man a deed to the land he had a perfect title. Let me call the gentleman's attention to something that I have in the way of proof of what I am going to say. Here is a statement of the loans made in the State of Kansas from the bank at Wichita, Kans., up to January 1, 1918, reported by the register of deeds or bonded abstractor. I have a list of each party's name to whom loans have been made. The description of the land, the section, town, and range, and the amount of money loaned with the assessed valuation of the land given. I made inquiry of some Members of the House from the State of Kansas, and I am told by them that the assessors in making their returns must make oath that the land has been assessed at its actual value.

The loans made in the State of Kansas up to January 1, 1918, amount to $3,801,900. The total valuation is $5,162,958; the loans amount to 73½ per cent of the valuation, when the law provides that the Government can only loan 50 per cent of the value of the land and not in excess of 20 per cent of the permanent insured value of the buildings thereon.

In the assessment of real estate the buildings are included with the land, so that in these valuations the land and buildings are included, and on both, which the law provides that the Federal farm-loan banks can not loan more than 50 per cent, the record shows they have loaned 73½ per cent of the total valuations.

I have not time to go into all the details of the loans, but they have loaned in one instance $10,000 on property valued at $7,000.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not want the House to believe that the law limits loans to the assessed value, but it is the actual appraised value.

Mr. FORDNEY. What is the difference between the actual value and your candid opinion as to its real value when you make oath that you have assessed it at the real value?

Mr. WINGO. In my State it would be 50 per cent.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, you can not make oath that you assessed it at its actual value when you know you fixed the assessment at but 50 per cent of its actual value; that would not be honest, would it?

Mr. WINGO. In regard to the law——

Mr. FORDNEY. The law provides that it shall be assessed at the actual value.

Mr. WINGO. I am talking about the Federal law, which will not permit them to loan upon the assessed value, but to put it on the actual value.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to hear what the gentleman has to say, because I have a high regard for him and his opinion, but I have information here that leads me to believe that the managers of those banks are disposing of that money in a loose manner. I have here a letter from one gentleman that writes me that loans were made on a piece of property in the State of Kansas, and that immediately upon receiving the loan the man left the property and said that it was the best sale he ever hoped to make of his property. He also points out a piece of property on which the Government loaned $1,000, which has been for sale at $600 for some time. Here is a statement from another man, who says that his neighbor, one of the loan board, borrowed $2,000 on his farm, and the adjoining farm, just as valuable, is offered to him to-day for $1,700.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but I will ask the gentleman to be brief.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Has the gentleman the description of the land, so that it could be located?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and I am going to put into the RECORD, if the House will permit me to do so—I shall put in the RECORD each and every loan made in the State of Kansas up to the 1st of January last, and the description of the land, together with the owner's name, to whom the loan has been made, the amount of the loan, and the assessed valuation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I asked the question because the gentleman is charging gross maladministration, and he ought to be specific.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not want to mislead anybody.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think the gentleman ought to ask permission to have that all put in.

Mr. FORDNEY. I shall do so. A gentleman named Smith—Capt. William S. A. Smith—who made a speech at St. Paul a few days ago, said "There will be only two of those banks that will show red ink." That is to say, they have all made a profit except two—the New England institution at Springfield, Mass., and the bank at Columbia, S. C. I have here a statement coming from a gentleman—Mr. R. Ingalls, of 307 East Seventeenth Street, New York—who made an investigation of this matter and writes me and says that he has taken these figures from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency. He states that according to the Comptroller of the Currency, on October 31, 1917, the 12 Federal land banks had no reserve or surplus and that their liabilities for funds received were $34,984,029.89; their assets, after deducting salaries and expenses, $34,273,843.84.

This apparent deficit of $709,186.05 and an indebtedness not itemized of $3,650,306.37 do not make a satisfactory showing. He says that the deficits apparent at each of the land banks at that date were as follows:

At Springfield, $49,058.11; Baltimore, $44,219.77; Columbus, $57,362.64; Louisville, $42,105.33; New Orleans, $71,387.09; St. Louis, $61,084.99; St. Paul, $86,655.70; Omaha, $46,273.95; Wichita, $79,784.74; Houston, $51,771.18; Berkeley, $66,035.24; Spokane, $52,537.20.

In other words, in the entire 12 banks the smallest deficit is $42,000, according to the records, whereas Mr. Smith says that they are all on the right side of the ledger except two. I made inquiry of some gentleman from the State of Kansas as to the loans made in the western part of Kansas, and was told that the banks in that State will make practically no loans at all in some counties because of the condition and the value of the land, it being poor. Yet the Federal Government has made loans there far above the assessed valuation as shown by the records as given me by Mr. Ingalls.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman proceed for 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to say that there is another very important District measure relative to the disposal of garbage that I desire to have disposed of. I shall not object to the gentleman having his 10 minutes, but I shall have to object to any more than that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows whether the farmers of Kansas who a few years ago borrowed $50,000,000 from the railroads have ever paid them back?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I do not know that.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What is that?

Mr. MEEKER. Whether or not the loan of $50,000,000 by the farmers three or four years ago in Kansas has been paid back to the railroads?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The farmers of Kansas do not owe a cent to the railroads.

Mr. MEEKER. When was it paid back?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It never was borrowed.

Mr. MEEKER. Begging the gentleman's pardon, the railroads hauled their wheat free, thus advancing them $50,000,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman has been reading fiction.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman let his statement stand as to that?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman speaks of a deficit shown by those banks in their reports. The gentleman intends to be entirely fair, I suppose; but does not the gentleman know that their books are not kept as they are in other banks, who charge up the discount when they make the loan, but they wait until the end of the year to collect the interest? Therefore the first year they had to run on their capital, charge up as if it were a deficit all expenses, and it will come out of the earnings at the end of the year.

Is not that the reason for the deficit? Does not the gentleman know that is the reason for the large deficit?

Mr. FORDNEY. If I did know I would have said it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will say that is the way their books are kept and therefore they have charged them with a deficit without giving them credit for the earnings of the loans they have made. They get no credit in bookkeeping until the end of the year. In other words, you loan a man a thousand dollars and he has to pay interest on it and then credit up yourself with the interest for one year, and you wait until the end of the year——

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, the gentleman is making a speech. I do not know whether he is right or wrong, but I do not think he is right.

Mr. STEVENSON. I know I am right.

Mr. FORDNEY. I would like to see some other proof than the gentleman's mere statement. Here is a gentleman's statement whose figures I take as being correct. He says the banks have lost money. I would like to have the gentleman present his figures, because I want to be corrected if I am in error.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will take time to present them when I have an opportunity.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to be right on this matter if I am wrong, but my candid opinion is that the Congress of the United States, gentlemen, where we authorized $200,000,000 of the people's money, collected for war purposes, placed at the disposal of these banks, there ought to be an investigation by Congress so that we may know whether or not these statements are correct or incorrect, for if the people's money has been thrown away, as indicated by these loans, we should know it. I have been and am loyal to this administration.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am loyal to this administration, and I am going to continue to be loyal in reference to carrying on this war; but I tell you, gentlemen, when you come in here with pretended war measures that prove to be political, then my loyalty to your party ceases. I am going to watch this enterprise as closely as I can and be loyal to the good people that I have the honor to represent here, sir, but I will draw the line when men here use these war measures for political purposes; and if this money is being loaned in an extravagant manner, as my information gives me reason to believe it has been, I am going to enter my most earnest protest. I say it is time that the Congress of the United States appointed a committee of Members of this House to investigate these loans and to see whether or not the loans as published, a list of which I will put in the RECORD, with the permission of the House, are correct or incorrect. I am not opposed to this system, but I am opposed to the squandering of the people's money on bad loans, poor property——

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not hear the first of the gentleman's statement. Is it charged that the banks were loaning money to farmers who are Democrats whether they have got ample security or not?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I did not say that, but I do say this——

Mr. CARAWAY. Well——

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute; let me answer my good friend. I do say this: That I am informed by some Members of Congress from the State of Kansas that the majority portion of those loans mentioned in this list are from counties in Democratic districts.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me ask the gentleman, maybe it is like it is down home, that nobody but Democrats own land.

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. CARAWAY. I said maybe nobody but Democrats ever owned land out there.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, well, I do not believe the gentleman is correct in that statement.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. STEENERSON. On that theory how do you account for the fact that North Dakota and Minnesota are two of the largest States where the largest sums have been loaned? And as to those two States I did not know that they were Democratic.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not want to charge positively that this money is being loaned to Democrats in discrimination against Republicans, but the gentleman in his question prompted me to say that——

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. I believe the gentleman has there a statement of the different banks. Does not it show that the smallest number of loans and the smallest volume of loans, with the exception probably of the Massachusetts district, is in Columbia, S. C., a district in which there is no Republican congressional district in the whole layout? Is not that so?

Mr. FORDNEY. Whether it is so or not, this man, Mr. Smith——

Mr. STEVENSON. Does it not say that the Columbia district is the smallest?

Mr. FORDNEY. Whether it is true or not, this man Smith——

Mr. STEVENSON. Who is a Republican, by the way.

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute, let me answer you.

I want to say to the gentleman that the one bank mentioned as having a deficit is in Columbia, S. C., and I do not think you could find a Republican in that district with a fine-tooth comb.

Mr. STEVENSON. And you will see that there has only been about $2,000 of loans, I believe it is, made there. It is the smallest loan there. Therefore we are not loaning it to the Democrats, at least.

Mr. FORDNEY. Whether that is true or whether it is not, Mr. Smith states that there is a deficit at that bank. Therefore if at Columbia, S. C., they are only small borrowers, they undoubtedly are small landowners.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand the gentleman is going to put in the statistical data to which he has referred.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir. The printed lists of loans in the State of Kansas.

Mr. WINGO. How much will that take up in the RECORD?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know. This is the amount, sir [indicating]. A list of the loans made by the Federal bank at Wichita, Kans.

Mr. WINGO. And you will specify the name of the borrower and the descriptions of the land, so that they can be located easily?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. The owner's name, the amount of rural credit, the assessed valuation of lands and buildings, the number of acres; for instance, John Henning obtained a loan of $1,500 on the assessed valuation of his land and buildings—$2,400. 160 acres, on the northwest quarter of section 26, township 26, range 24.

Mr. WINGO. Reserving further the right to object, I do not believe the gentleman would make a charge unless he believes it; but he has charged criminal maladministration. Has the gentleman introduced a resolution?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I have not. And I want to say to you I do not accuse anybody of being dishonest; but I do claim that there has been less caution used than should have been in making these loans

Mr. WINGO. I have no brief for the board. If they have done all that the gentleman has charged, he ought to file an appropriate resolution here. If they have done what the gentleman has charged, I will join with him in investigating; but I do dislike to see a gentleman of his standing make an attack on this system at a time when its enemies are trying to break it down.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not an enemy of this system. I only criticize the parties in charge of the loans—if my information is correct bad loans have been made.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman has evidence that will justify that charge, they are guilty of maladministration and in justice to the House he ought to file a proper resolution to see whether it is true or not.

Mr. FORDNEY. In justice to Mr. R. Ingalls, who gave me much of the information I have in this matter, I wish to insert in the RECORD some of the correspondence I received from him.

But first, for example, suppose a party asks a loan on his farm, valued as follows: Land valued at $2,000 and the permanent, insured value of buildings, $2,000; total value, $4,000. The Farm Loan Board by law is authorized to loan 50 per cent of the land value, or $1,000, and 20 per cent of the permanent insured value of buildings, or $400; or a total of $1,400; or 35 per cent of the assessed valuation, provided the same is its actual value. An examination of list of loans given below will reveal the fact that the loans described are far in excess of the percentage authorized by law.

In justice to Mr. Flannagan and Mr. Ingalls, I here give some correspondence between these gentlemen:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FEDERAL FARM LOAN BOARD,
Washington, April 9, 1918.

Mr. R. INGALLS,
307 East Seventeenth Street, New York City.

DEAR MR. INGALLS: I see you quote me as saying the board had "no available figures showing the cost of business"—Letter of Secretary Flannagan, December, 1917. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Apr. 6, 1918, p. 4741.)

Will you kindly advise me date of letter from which this extract is taken and to whom it was written?

I wish to ascertain the connection and circumstances under which the statement was made.

Yours, very truly,

W. W. FLANNAGAN,
Secretary Farm Loan Board.

APRIL 12, 1918.

Mr. W. W. FLANNAGAN,
Secretary Federal Farm Loan Board, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FLANNAGAN: I have to acknowledge your kind reply of April 11. I have never received a list of the States that have legalized the bonds of the Federal land banks as an investment for fiduciary and public funds. I should greatly appreciate the favor if you would send me the list, and also designate those States which have also legalized bonds of joint-stock land banks for such investments.

Mr. Hammond says he can not locate any of the correspondence he had with you and Mr. Lobdell about costs of business. With a view to helping you uncover it out of the bureau's files I will give the following extract from a letter of his dated January 31, 1918:

"In addition to the question of whether the board knows just what it is about I would mention the fact that I derived great discouragement from the board's reply to my request for information as to the cost of handling farm loans. * * * I wrote the Federal Farm Loan Board stating that I presumed the spread fixed by law was based upon established figures and that the board could show why a joint-stock land bank should earn attractive dividends for its stock on a one-point spread and that I should appreciate the supporting figures. The board replied that the data I asked for was not available. To loan several hundred millions of dollars as the obligation of banks engaged in a business upon which there is no available data as to cost would seem to me courageous to say the least."

Of course the correspondence is preserved somewhere. I saw and read the board's reply. My memory is that its date was December, and that it was signed by you and not by Mr. Lobdell. I hope this extract will serve your purpose. If the quotation should be ascribed to Mr. Lobdell instead of to you, and if some other date than December should be given, I would see that the correction is made before any reprints of the RECORD are made.

Are any figures as to the cost of handling farm loans yet available? I should like very much to have them, and I wish to thank you for the amortization tables just received.

Yours, very truly,

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FEDERAL FARM LOAN BUREAU,
Washington, April 16, 1918.

Mr. R. INGALLS,
No. 307 East Seventeenth Street, New York City.

DEAR MR. INGALLS: Your favor of the 12th duly received. The list of the States which have legalized Federal farm-loan bonds as an investment for fiduciary funds was mailed to you on the 11th and supposedly crossed your letter in the mails. If not received it will be duplicated upon request.

Concerning the matter of your quotation "from Secretary Flannagan's letter December, 1917," as follows: The board has "no available figures showing the cost of business," it appears I never wrote such a letter. The nearest approach to it is in a letter from Judge Lobdell (a member of the board) to Mr. L. P. Hammond under date of January 10, 1918, which reads as follows:

"Replying to your letter of recent date to our Mr. Flannagan, I regret to state that the board has not in hand specific data which would be of material value to you."

This letter was written in reply to a letter from Mr. Hammond, addressed to me under date of December 27, 1917, in which Mr. Hammond sought information in order to ascertain "whether investment in the stock of joint-stock land banks and operation in the distribution of bonds of the joint-stock land banks appeared to be profitable."

You will see, therefore, that Judge Lobdell's letter had reference to an entirely different subject from which your "quotation" seeks to apply. Judge Lobdell says in effect that there is no specific data available to determine the question whether or not an investment in the stock of joint-stock land banks would be profitable.

Your "quotation" makes the impression that the Farm Loan Board was derelict in not knowing the cost of business done by the Federal land banks, these banks being the exemplars of the system you are attacking.

I submit to you that this is unfair, and also that it is not in accordance with the facts of the case; the board has always known the cost of business done by each of the Federal land banks, and kept in close touch with it from the beginning.

Yours, truly,

W. W. FLANNAGAN,
Secretary Farm Loan Board.

P. S.—You should write Mr. FORDNEY that the quotation was in error, and also have it eliminated from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Will you do it?

W. W. F.

NEW YORK, April 17, 1918.

Hon. J. W. FORDNEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FORDNEY: Inclosed is some correspondence from Mr. Flannagan, secretary of the Federal Farm Loan Board. Since Secretary Flannagan turned Mr. Hammond's letter over to Member Lobdell, Mr. Flannagan is, of course, responsible for the reply. There is very little difference in sense between the words "no specific data in hand" and "no available figures." However, I will in the reprints note this change of the paragraph objected to by Mr. Flannagan:

"The act requires that both the Federal and the joint-stock land banks shall keep expenses and profits within a one-point spread. Replying to a query as to the effect of this provision on the latter, Member Lobdell wrote, on January 10, 1918: 'The board has not in hand specific data which would be of material value to you.'"

I feel that, if you think this matter of sufficient importance for comment, this paragraph would answer your purposes. Kindly return my inclosed correspondence with Mr. Flannagan as soon as you are through with it.

Also, I should like the return of those two newspaper clippings. I await with keen interest what you are going to say this week.

Very sincerely, R. INGALLS.

The following figures or statement of appropriations for this system I obtained from the Committee on Appropriations:

Federal Farm Loan appropriations.

1917. For purchase of Federal land banks' stocks (Pub. 158, 64th Cong.) ($9,000,000 limit) expended in 1917	$8,880,315
For salaries and expenses:
1917. (Pub. 272, 64th Cong.) Deficiency	100,000
1917. (Pub. 158, 64th Cong.) Act creating banks	100,000
1918. (Pub. 381, 64th Cong.) L. E. J. Appropriation act	260,000
1919. H. R. 10358, L. E. J. for 1919	241,620
Purchase of farm loan banks' bonds. (Pub. 95, 65th Cong.)—
Not exceeding in 1918	100,000,000
Not exceeding in 1919	100,000,000
Total	209,581,935
In addition, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make deposits, upon the request of the board, out of the Treasury a sum not exceeding $6,000,000 at any one time. (Pub. 158, 64th Cong.)	6,000,000

Gentlemen, my object in calling the attention of the House to this matter is—if my information is correct—much incompetency has been displayed by men whose duty it is to pass upon loans already made, and that the Government is not getting proper security for the money loaned.

I thank the House for their attention.

GARBAGE COLLECTION, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10613.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10613, to provide for the collection and disposal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse of the District of Columbia, with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10613, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10613) to provide for the collection and disposal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That in order that the service of the collection of garbage and miscellaneous refuse in the District of Columbia and the disposal of the same may be continued without further interruption, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, if in their judgment it is deemed to be the best interest of said District, are hereby authorized to purchase or lease all or any part of the plant, equipment, buildings, and grounds used by the Washington Fertilizer Co., the present contractor, for the collection, removal, reduction, or disposal of garbage, and for the purchase or lease of all or any part of the plant, equipment, buildings and grounds used by M. R. Ready, the present contractor, for the collection, removal, and disposal of miscellaneous refuse.

SEC. 2. That in case a price can not be agreed upon between the commissioners and the parties in interest, for the purchase or lease of all or such parts of said plants, equipment, buildings, and grounds as may be required, then, and in that event, all or such parts of the said plants, equipment, buildings, and grounds, hereinafter described as may be necessary, are hereby declared to be and the same are hereby condemned and appropriated to and for the use of the United States of America, to be used, operated, and controlled by it, by and through the agency hereafter provided, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as agents of the United States, be, and they are hereby authorized and directed on the 1st day of July, 1918, to take charge and possession in the name of, for, and by authority of the United States of America, of all or so much of the property, real and personal, described in section 1 paragraph 1, as may be necessary, and to use the same for the collection, removal, reduction, or disposal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That in the event the property hereinbefore described is not purchased or leased, and is condemned as hereinbefore provided, it shall be the duty of the Attorney General of the United States to appoint a commission of appraisal and award, consisting of three persons, to appraise the value of the properties condemned and appropriated, and to award to the respective owners just compensation therefor. The said commission of appraisal and award shall, as soon as possible, file an inventory of the physical assets in use and useful in conducting the service of the collection and removal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse, and the value of the same, proper allowance being made for depreciation. Each commissioner of the commission of appraisal and award shall make oath before a judge of a court of the United States to faithfully perform such duty. The said commission of appraisal and award shall have power, and it shall be its duty, to summon witnesses with books and papers before it for all of the parties in interest and to require such witnesses to testify, and it shall give a full hearing on the compensation to be awarded, and give notice of the filing of such award to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and the owners of said property, and any party in interest dissatisfied with the amount of such award may appeal from the same, which appeal shall be reviewed by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, which court is hereby vested with jurisdiction for such purpose; and an appeal may similarly be taken from the decision of such court of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States for a final review of the amount of the award. Such final award shall bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from the date the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have taken possession of the property until the date of its final payment.

SEC. 4. That the expenses of procuring evidence of title, or expenses of appraisal and award, or both, shall be paid out of such appropriations as are, or may be provided for the collection and disposal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse.

SEC. 5. That not exceeding $85,000 of the appropriation authorized herein may be expended for the purchase of the property of the garbage contractor; and not exceeding $50,000 may be expended for the purchase of the property of the miscellaneous refuse contractor: Provided, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to acquire by lease all or any part of the plant, equipment, buildings, and grounds of either of the present contractors engaged in the collection and removal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse, or property used by them, or such other equipment, buildings, and grounds as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 6. That should the Commissioners of the District of Columbia find that the garbage in the District can be disposed of in a sanitary manner and as economically by feeding it to pigs, live stock, and poultry on the land of the Home for the Aged and Infirm, located at Blue Plains, District of Columbia, or on the land of the workhouse and reformatory of the District of Columbia, located at Occoquan and Lorton, Va., or both, or on such other land as the said commissioners may be able to acquire by purchase or lease in the States of Virginia or Maryland, the said commissioners are authorized to use either or all of said designated lands, or to purchase or lease land in the States of Virginia or Maryland for the purpose, and to adopt the pig, live stock, or poultry feeding method of disposal.

SEC. 7. That not exceeding $200,000 of the appropriation authorized herein may be expended for the purchase of pigs, live stock, and poultry.

SEC. 8. That should the Commissioners of the District of Columbia find that under existing circumstances the methods of disposal of garbage hereinbefore authorized are inadvisable, they are authorized to secure for temporary use sufficient land, and to acquire the necessary equipment to bury the garbage collected in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 9. That every person, corporation, association, or institution in the District of Columbia, under such rules and regulations as the commissioners may prescribe, may transport in closed metal containers from the place of origin to places outside of the District of Columbia any refuse, including meat, bread, and vegetables, not in a decayed or decomposed condition, to be fed to poultry, pigs, or other live stock at any place where such feeding is not prohibited by law.

SEC. 10. That products arising from any method of disposal adopted by the commissioners under the authority of this act may be sold, and the proceeds therefrom shall be repaid to the then current appropriation for the collection and disposal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse.

SEC. 11. That in order to put into effect and operate such method of disposal as may be adopted by the commissioners under the provisions of this act, the said commissioners are authorized to secure the necessary means of transportation, including the hire or purchase of horses and horse-drawn vehicles and passenger-carrying and other motor-propelled vehicles; additional equipment, buildings and machinery; and to employ expert and other personal services and labor; and to pay traveling, maintenance, incidental, and contingent expenses.

SEC. 12. That for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this act an appropriation in the sum of $620,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized, one-half to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and one-half out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, before the motion was made to rise at 3 o'clock I had 10 minutes left for general debate, and it was the understanding that when we went back into Committee of the Whole again those 10 minutes might be used. I do not want to use the entire 10 minutes, but I promised five to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WASON], and if it is proper now I will yield to the gentleman from New Hampshire that much time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, last Thursday, while the conference report on the bill (H. R. 9054) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, was being considered by the House, I read some correspondence between the United States Food Administrator, Herbert Hoover; the Department of State, signed by Robert Lansing and Frank L. Polk, Acting Secretary of State; and myself, which may be found on pages 5305, 5306 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

This correspondence was of such a character and disclosed such condition of affairs that I commented thereon briefly. I felt then that no reason existed why an order appointing Mr. Hoover Food Administrator should not be made public or a Member of Congress should be denied the right to read the same.

We enacted the law which created this office, and I believed we had a right to examine the instrument of appointment and learn the extent of authority conferred. Those letters show I was denied the right to read the order of appointment of the Food Administrator or obtain a copy of the same. Such a denial to a Member of Congress I criticized by suggesting there must be some reason therefor which would be discovered were the contents thereof made public.

Last Saturday afternoon I was called on the telephone by an official of the Food Administration and was amazed when he told me the Executive order appointing Mr. Hoover Food Administrator was a part of a public document of the House of Representatives numbered 890.

The mantle of secrecy thus raised, the private order suddenly discovered as public and had been since last January, I wondered how on the 18th day of last March it could have been "confidential," as stated by the Secretary of State in his letter to me refusing me my right to read the same.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to comment upon the views which apparently govern some executive and administrative officials of our Government in dealing with Members of Congress upon public matters.

Why did the Food Administrator, Herbert Hoover, on the 25th day of February last, notify me, in writing, that my request for a copy of the Executive order of the President had been referred to the Secretary of State, in whose custody it remained, when he, Herbert Hoover, on the 31st day of January last, in his report of itemized statements of purchases and disbursements of his organization from August 11 to December 31, 1917, inclusive, had included a copy of this Executive order?

Why did Mr. Hoover neglect to notify me that it could be found in that report?

Why did the honorable Secretary of State, Robert Lansing, in writing, on February 28 last, inform me that the Executive order of August 10, 1917, appointing Mr. Hoover United States Food Administrator had not been made public, and for that reason a copy could not be forwarded to Mr. Greeley?

Why did the Acting Secretary of State, Frank L. Polk, on March 6 last, inform me, in writing, "that the Executive order of August 10, 1917, appointing Mr. Hoover has not been made public, and for that reason I regret to say that your request can not be complied with."

Why did the honorable Secretary of State, Robert Lansing, on March 18 last, in writing, inform me "that inasmuch as the order is confidential, and as I have no authority to show it to you, it is regretted that I can not comply with your request"?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Hampshire has expired.

Mr. WASON. May I have one minute more?

Mr. CARY. I had only 10 minutes altogether, and I promised the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] five minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. I will yield one minute to the gentleman.

Mr. CARY. All right, then; one more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, the inaccuracy of the above statements of the several gentlemen mentioned is of little concern to me compared with the attitude of the Department of State, and at some later time, should a like situation arise between a Member of Congress and an executive or administrative official, I may attempt a protest to the extent of my ability against such denial of the inherent rights heretofore enjoyed by Members of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. CARY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the four minutes remaining to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, in looking through an old book shop not long ago, I fell upon two volumes entitled the "Book of Days." Running through them, I found that every day in the year had some special history and significance. Every day in the year had been observed with some interest, joy, or solemnity by some nation, people, or community.

The book of American days would be a brief one. But as time goes on days of observance are increasing, and perhaps a century from now our days for observance or celebration will be many. Then will labor and business have more frequent relaxation, while opportunity for social enjoyment will be greatly increased.

Speaking of American days of either national or general observance, we can trace Christmas to old Judea. New Year's, celebrated by nearly all peoples, nations, and religions, is conventionally based upon the course and progress of the sun, and and is varied by latitude. Pennsylvania gave us Independence Day; New England furnished Thanksgiving; Grand Army of the Republic gave us Decoration Day; the toiling millions have set aside a day for labor; and Nebraska, treeless plain of 50 years ago, fathers Arbor Day. [Applause.]

Arbor Day is recognized in every State in the Union. The founder of Arbor Day was J. Sterling Morton, one of Nebraska's early settlers and one of its greatest builders. He was a philosopher, a scholar, and statesman. He was the first Cabinet officer Nebraska ever furnished the Nation, being Secretary of Agriculture during President Cleveland's second term. As a farmer, editor, and statesman he left his impress upon his State and Nation. But he will be known in history best as the founder of Arbor Day. He believed that a man was doing part of his duty if he caused two blades of grass to grow where only one grew before. But he believed that he was more nearly fulfilling his full duty if he caused a stately tree to rise where only the annual plant had hitherto grown. [Applause.]

In 1872 Morton induced the Nebraska State Board of Agriculture to set aside a day for tree planting, to be known as Arbor Day. Three years later legislative enactment made it a legal holiday. Since that time all the States in the Union have followed, each one, however, selecting its own date in accordance with the time for planting trees.

In the days of our great Civil War, when Nebraska was a Territory and more than 30 per cent of her inhabitants were in the Union Army or fighting Indians, the grass grew, the game fed upon it, the prairie fire consumed what remained, while fugitive seeds, wafted by the winds, were burned or the life scorched out of their young sprouts. Only along the banks of some streams were a few sprouts allowed to become shrubs and those shrubs permitted to reach the doubtful dignity of trees.

The war being over, soldiers and others came to Nebraska, taking homesteads and timber claims. They found no rock or other materials for building. There were no trees out of which the homes could be built after the manner of their fathers' log dwellings farther east. They had recourse to the dugout and sod houses, now largely memories in Nebraska.

But as it was said "Necessity is the mother of invention," so might we say "Famine is the father of plenty." Man always values most highly that which he has not. It was then Morton came from the East, settling near the present site of Nebraska City, on the banks of the Missouri. He saw Nebraska's large want and proceeded to demonstrate the feasibility of its fulfillment. So he built a home and round it set out many trees from many parts of the Union. He watered them and protected them from fire. They grew and before many years their stately forms and spreading branches were a comfort in summer, a protection in winter, and to the vision of him who since became known as the founder of Arbor Lodge presented in miniature the change which was to come over our State.

"Plant trees" was written on the head of Arbor Lodge stationery. "Plant trees" was rung in the ears of every public audience. "Plant trees" was taught in the schools in springtime. "Protect trees" was advised in the public press. Soon the trees themselves, protected from prairie fires, began to do the rest.

Now, in Nebraska you need not travel far for comforting shade or living landmark. It was estimated that in 1915 the growth of tree life in Nebraska was sufficient to furnish fuel for Nebraska homes.

In Saline County, near the city of Friend, in my congressional district, resides Josiah Miner, a veteran of the Civil War. Early after the close of the war he took a homestead and has resided upon it ever since. He has groves of varied species, deciduous and evergreen. From trees planted by himself he has sawed lumber for a large comfortable dwelling and many convenient barns, granaries, and other outbuildings. Among the trees which adorn this homestead are 10 acres of black walnut which he offers to the Government for making gunstocks. This is a type of Nebraska development.

Incidentally let me suggest that Nebraska has just gone grandly over the top in the third liberty loan. On thrift stamps Nebraska has a phenomenal statement, as the following published statement shows:

NEBRASKA BUYS TENTH OF WAR STAMPS SOLD—HER PER CAPITA IS $11.06, WITH DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA SECOND—OTHER FIGURES.

Nebraska has bought one-tenth of all the war savings and thrift stamps sold since the campaign opened nearly five months ago, according to a report issued by the national war savings committee.

Up to April 1 the total receipts from savings stamps sales were $149,361,972, of which Nebraska contributed $14,343,991. New York was second, with $12,273,783, and Missouri third, with $11,183,305. Pennsylvania has raised $10,868,034.

Nebraska has raised $11.06 for every man, woman, and child within her borders. The District of Columbia is second with $3.75 per capita, and Missouri and Kansas follow with $3.14 and $3.11, respectively.

Of the 20 leading States, all but 5 are west of the Mississippi River.

In 1895, being a member of the Nebraska State Senate, I introduced a resolution which passed, by almost unanimous vote, both branches of the legislature and was signed by the governor, Silas A. Holcomb. The resolution was as follows:

Whereas the State is preeminently a tree-planting State; and
Whereas many honorable State organizations have by resolution designated Nebraska as the "Tree Planters' State": Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Nebraska, That Nebraska shall hereafter in a popular sense be known and referred to as the "Tree Planters' State."

Nebraskans would reverse the history and experience of many older cities, States, and countries. Tyre, Sidon, Carthage, Laodocea, and a hundred other cities which marked the sea coast and dotted the interior of western Asia, northern Africa, and eastern Europe are now in ruins or lie buried beneath the shifting sands, while round them lie the wind-swept barren plains once fertile, beautiful, and fair. The rapacity of man destroyed the forests to build the town, let the soil parch under the sun, and, parching, lost its humus until it was lifted by the winds and blown hither and yon, stifling vegetation and leaving, except along the valleys, desert waste where once had been produced food enough for the millions of earth. The denuded forest tells a sad tale, the barren fields are still more pathetic, but most to be deplored is the vanished energy, fire, and patriotism of people once noted for culture, industry, and valor, but who now bow to the rule of petty tyrants and lead lives far in the rear of the world's progress. Their history is preserved only by their enemies and no worthy heritage is provided for the generations to come.

I have just received the annual proclamation for Arbor Day this day issued by acting Gov. Edgar Howard. It is as follows:

PROCLAMATION.

Obedient to the command of custom and the law of the Commonwealth, I hereby make proclamation that Monday, April 22, 1918, shall be set apart and observed as Arbor Day. To the pioneers upon the prairies the trees were only a memory of the homes from whence the settlers came, only the intrepid few among them being bold to even dream of the arboreal magnificence of our Nebraska in this present. Thanks to the intelligent endeavors of one sterling pioner, the Hon. J. Sterling Morton, by the Nation now acknowledged as the "father of Arbor Day," the dream of trees has given place to the fact of trees, and all Nebraska has been adorned by practice of the precepts proclaimed by that far-seeing lover of the beautiful in nature.

In the Arbor Day proclamations uttered by the governors of the Eastern States runs a vein of sorrow and regret because of the vanished grandeur of the mighty forests which have gone down before the resistless march of civilization, and in each is a plea for speedy restoration in some measure of the vanished wealth of woods which once adorned the landscapes. To the people of our own Commonwealth come not the pangs of regret for the loss of tree glories, but only the anticipatory joys of the arboreal glory which shall some day be ours if we be faithful in the practice of the virtues of the pioneer fathers of our Arbor Day.

In the best spirit of our Arbor Day, I, Edgar Howard, acting governor of Nebraska, call upon the people of the Commonwealth, and especially upon those in charge of all public and parochial schools, for earnest endeavor to renew the health of the tree-planting spirit by appropriate public and private observance of the day.

And may I not in this hour of the Nation's peril plead with all our people to unite with me in supplication to the Father for the speedy dawning of that glad day when the forests of France and of all lands may again bless the earth with fragrance untarnished by the taint of war?

Given under my hand at the executive office in Lincoln this 15th day of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and eighteen, of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and forty-second, and of the admission of Nebraska to the Union of States the fifty-second.

By the governor:

EDGAR HOWARD.

[SEAL.] CHARLES W. POOL,
Secretary of State for the State of Nebraska.

In harmony with the sentiment and enterprise of the pioneers and those who now live in our State, and in conformity with the proclamations annually made by our governors, we have planted the cedar of pride, the pine of symmetry, the apple of abundance, the maple of beauty, the ash of endurance, the oak of strength, the acacia of remembrance, and the elm of grandeur to temper the winds, the frost, and the sun, control the rainfall, and modify the climate and season for the comfort and delight of men in the generations to come. [Applause.]

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-eight Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Call the roll.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration H. R. 10613, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 244 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be entered on the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe Members will be impatient to get away so early in the evening, in view of the importance of this bill.

The present contract for the removal of garbage expires on the 30th day of June. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have advertised for new bids. The present contract calls for $69,000 a year for the removal of the city garbage. New bids were received by the commissioners. The lowest bid was $143,000, but when the low bidder came to comply with the terms of the contract under which he had bid he was dissatisfied with his own bid and forfeited a $3,000 check rather than comply with the terms of his own bid.

When the 1st of July comes there will be no provision whatever for the removal of garbage from the District of Columbia. This bill authorizes a program which, if authorized, the Committee on Appropriations will put into effect.

On this short statement I hope Members will forego their impatience to get away and will let us dispose of this bill before we adjourn this afternoon. [Applause.] A critical condition faces the District of Columbia, and I think everybody ought to stay here and do his duty relative to that condition which faces us if we do not a pass a bill upon which the Appropriations Committee can act when it comes up.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope there will be no prolonged discussion. Of course, there may be some features of the bill that Members may not like, but I hope that a short statement will satisfy the Members of the House as to the importance of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Why does not the gentleman let the Clerk read a section of the bill?

Mr. GARNER. Perhaps everybody is ready to pass it.

Mr. SISSON. All right. Let the Clerk proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That in case a price can not be agreed upon between the commissioners and the parties in interest, for the purchase or lease of all or such parts of said plants, equipment, buildings and grounds as may be required, then, and in that event, all or such parts of the said plants, equipment, buildings and grounds hereinbefore described as may be necessary, are hereby declared to be and the same are hereby condemned and appropriated to and for the use of the United States of America, to be used, operated, and controlled by it, by and through the agency hereafter provided, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as agents of the United States, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed on the 1st day of July, 1918, to take charge and possession, in the name of, for, and by the authority of the United States of America of all or so much of the property, real and personal, described in section 1, paragraph 1, as may be necessary, and to use the same for the collection, removal, reduction, or disposal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman if there are at present two contracts relating to the disposition and collection of garbage; and if there are two, whether both have expired, or will in the near future?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The contract does not expire until the 30th of June.

Mr. WALSH. Are there two?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is one contract for garbage and another contract for other refuse—paper, ashes, night soil, and dead animals.

Mr. WALSH. The purpose is to take over the property of the present contractors for the District in the future to take care of the collection and disposition of refuse and garbage?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is done only in case of the inability of the commissioners to get bids.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state where the plants are now located?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The garbage plant is in Virginia; I do not know how far it is from here.

Mr. MAPES. The statement of the commissioners is that it is about 30 miles.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The paper and ash plant is over on the Eastern Branch of the river.

Mr. WALSH. In the District?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Are the two plants engaged in this business in any other community, or is their business simply for the District?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no knowledge on the subject, but my impression is that they are engaged here solely.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman any idea as to the sum of money that will be required for the acquisition of these plants?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The garbage plant has been appraised and found to be worth about $85,000, and this bill provides that it may be taken over at not exceeding $85,000.

Mr. WALSH. What information has the gentleman with reference to the refuse plant?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I have no information as to that. If I am correctly informed, the man has thrown up the contract and the commissioners themselves are having the work done. They are removing the ashes, paper, dead animals, night soil, and so forth.

Mr. WALSH. I understood the gentleman to say that unless some remedy is provided by Congress that after the 1st of July the District of Columbia will be without means for taking care of the garbage situation or authorizing its disposition?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is it exactly. When the 1st day of July comes, without the passage of this bill the garbage must go into the back yards and alleys without provision for its removal.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky, in line 5, page 1, why do you use the word "further?"

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Because there is already an interruption. There was an interruption in the ash contract. The man has quit removing ashes and the commissioners are now removing them.

Mr. LITTLE. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That not exceeding $85,000 of the appropriation authorized herein may be expended for the purchase of the property of the garbage contractor; and not exceeding $50,000 may be expended for the purchase of the property of the miscellaneous refuse contractor: Provided, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to acquire by lease all or any part of the plant, equipment, buildings, and grounds of either of the present contractors engaged in the collection and removal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse, or property used by them, or such other equipment, buildings, and grounds as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In line 13, page 4, section 5, ought that not to be "a sum not exceeding $85,000?"

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I think the gentleman from Ohio is technically correct, but I do not think it is at all necessary. It would be quite clearly understood that $85,000 means a sum of money. I do not think it is material.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That should the Commissioners of the District of Columbia find that the garbage in the District can be disposed of in a sanitary manner and as economically by feeding it to pigs, live stock, and poultry on the land of the Home for the Aged and Infirm, located at Blue Plains, D. C., or on the land of the workhouse and reformatory of the District of Columbia, located at Occoquan and Lorton, Va., or both, or on such other land as the said commissioners may be able to acquire by purchase or lease in the States of Virginia or Maryland, the said commissioners are authorized to use either or all of said designated lands, or to purchase or lease land in the States of Virginia or Maryland for the purpose, and to adopt the pig, live stock, or poultry feeding method of disposal.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the phrase "live stock," does not that include the word "pigs"?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; live stock includes pigs.

Mr. FESS. Why should you set out something that is live stock as if it was not included in the term?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If I had written the bill, I would have omitted the word "pigs" and have said "live stock."

Mr. FESS. It is repeated in line 17 and further on.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It is synonymous all the way through.

Mr. FESS. Why should they do that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know; but it makes no trouble.

Mr. FESS. I suppose not. I will withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That not exceeding $200,000 of the appropriation authorized herein may be expended for the purchase of pigs, live stock, and poultry.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Do I understand that the District government or some branch of it will purchase pigs, live stock, and poultry, in addition to acquiring these plants for the sole purpose of disposing of garbage?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; that is an alternative proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Alternative to what?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. To the acquirement of a plant. We do not know just how quickly the plant can be put into operation. It may require a lot of improvement.

Mr. WALSH. Is not the plant running at the present time?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; but in an inferior way. It will require a lot of improvements.

Mr. WALSH. What would become of the live stock if they were bought temporarily while the plant was being put into first class condition?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Sold, and the money returned to the fund from which it came.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will pardon me, I desire to ask him a question not pertaining to the section under consideration; but, as I understand, these condemnation proceedings instituted for the acquisition of this plant that is located in Virginia are vested in the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. What page is that?

Mr. WALSH. Page 3, section 3, and in section 4.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a little unusual to vest jurisdiction over the acquisition of property in a court which is outside the jurisdiction where the property is located?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. The gentleman will notice that the proceeding is to be in the name of the United States, and the property is to be taken over in the name of the United States, and the United States has taken over property for public purposes of the District of Columbia in the States of Virginia and Maryland. Land for the Occoquan prison was acquired by the same kind of a proceeding.

Mr. WALSH. Is this the United States Court of Appeals?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; it is the Federal court.

Mr. WALSH. In the District?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the gentleman from Kentucky tell why the $200,000 has been fixed for this particular purpose of purchasing pigs, live stock, and poultry? And before he answers, I call his attention to the fact that in section 5 $85,000 is appropriated for the purchase of the property of the garbage contractor, and not exceeding $50,000 for the purchase of the property of the miscellaneous-refuse contractor. More money may be expended than that, but if the property of the garbage contractor is to be bought at not more than $85,000, and that of the miscellaneous-refuse contractor is not worth more than $50,000, why $200,000 to expend for live stock?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The live stock would not go to those places. It is an alternative proposition. One is to feed it without acquiring the property, and the other is to acquire the property and not feed it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It occurred to me from a hurried reading that that was a disproportionate amount.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. If the garbage is fed to live stock, it will take a large sum of money to buy the stock, because the stock is so high. The gentleman will bear in mind that this is only an authorization.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; not exceeding $200,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; and the Committee on Appropriations will have to handle the appropriation of that money, and then would come the question to which the gentleman now refers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the District committee have any testimony showing that such an amount would be required?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; we had the commissioners before us.

Mr. MASON. And the engineer commissioner?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; the engineer commissioner has the matter largely in hand.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was so large an amount suggested as $200,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. LOBECK. My understanding is that if they can get this property in Virginia or can find a place to dump the garbage somewhere within the District, the commissioners will do so; otherwise the District commissioners are going into the pig business because they can get farms that are of no value for raising crops adjoining the District of Columbia, somewhere near by, and that they think it is a good proposition to get these pigs down on these farms so as to fertilize the land. They are going further into the pig business, then, to purchase pigs, but they are going also to buy female pigs of good variety and get males and go into the pig-raising business for a number of years. Now, that is what one of the commissioners of the District of Columbia said to the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOBECK. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That does not appear to be a function connected with the disposition of garbage. That is really a proposition of increasing the quantity of garbage, I would say.

Mr. LOBECK. No; it is to fertilize the land, so it shall become valuable for raising crops hereafter.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What has that to do with the disposition of garbage?

Mr. LOBECK. If they go to work and feed the hogs it will fertilize the land at the same time and make the land valuable.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit me, in his time, to ask the chairman of the committee whether this is the real purpose of starting a hog farm—for the purpose of fertilizing the land?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If anybody has that purpose, I have not heard of it.

Mr. LOBECK. I heard it in the committee room by Col. Gardiner, one of the commissioners.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There was something said about that, but if a sow has pigs, what are you going to do with them, kill them or sell them? Of course, you do not want to——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a fair proposition, but is the District of Columbia to be authorized to go into the business of fertilizing farms by purchasing pigs merely for that purpose?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; they would not be purchased for that purpose, but wherever a pig is put the droppings will fertilize the land, as a matter of course.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman if these farms become the property of the District of Columbia?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is no authorization to buy land or any extensive plant except the garbage-reduction plant.

Mr. LOBECK. There is live stock named in this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But if you have the garbage and have no place to put it, it ought to be fed to something.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "two hundred thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "ten thousand."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 15, strike out "two hundred thousand" and insert "ten thousand."

Mr. ROBBINS. I think, gentlemen of the committee, of all the ridiculous propositions that ever was put before a sensible legislative body this proposition of spending $200,000 in buying chickens and pigs, which are to eat the garbage of the city of Washington, is the most ridiculous. Take the city of Pittsburgh. It has a garbage plant established in my district and there they are burning up and incinerating all the garbage of that great city, transported to this plant in closed cars, collected in the city in closed wagons and tanks, and out of that garbage they extract a certain amount of fertilizer, oil, metal, and other articles of value, which the contractor sells. Here you propose to feed it to pigs that are to be eaten by people as food and to chickens that are to be eaten by people, consumed as food by human beings. Whoever heard of a proposition of that kind? Do you believe a pig that is fed on garbage of a great city would be fit to eat?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Of course they would be.

Mr. ROBBINS. It would produce in the first place cholera and diseases in the pigs and in the next place contribute it to the people who eat such pork.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. There is not a farmer in the United States——

Mr. ROBBINS. Wait a minute; I have not yielded the floor, and the gentleman can ask a question when I get through with this statement. I do not know of a city that attempts to dispose of its garbage by feeding it to food-producing animals, such as pigs and chickens. The way to dispose of the garbage is to destroy it.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. ROBBINS. I do.

Mr. LITTLE. I wish to say that Kansas City, Mo., used to do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Louisville, Ky., is doing that. It got in a bad condition and could not handle its garbage, and it is to-day feeding its garbage to hogs.

Mr. ROBBINS. I never heard of a thing of that sort.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. They are doing that now.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am not doubting the gentleman's word, but it is doomed to be a failure. The garbage of a city is the refuse of a city. It is the stuff that is thrown away as worthless.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman does not know anything about feeding pigs.

Mr. ROBBINS. I know something about it. I know a pig must be fed clean, wholesome food if it is to be a clean, wholesome animal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Every farmer in the United States feeds his garbage to pigs.

Mr. ROBBINS. But they feed it in the condition of sour milk and cullings from the table, and try to see that it is in clean, palatable condition and healthy. The farmers all give this careful attention.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. I will.

Mr. MAPES. I want to interrupt the gentleman to add my statement that Grand Rapids, Mich., disposed of its garbage for several years in such a way. It was fed to pigs, and very satisfactorily.

Mr. ROBBINS. But they have discarded it, have they not?

Mr. MAPES. Because they could not get the contractor to renew his contract.

Mr. ROBBINS. The pigs all died of cholera, I suppose.

Mr. MAPES. No; they did not.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. The reduction of table scraps to feed stock is the most modern method of all. The gentleman is confusing pigs and goats. Goats eat cans. We are talking about table scraps.

Mr. ROBBINS. Do not let us treat with levity at this time an appropriation of $200,000 of the taxpayers' money. Let us be serious. You are proposing to invest $200,000 in pigs and chickens to eat up the garbage of Washington City.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. In just a moment. If it were possible to select the meat cuttings and the bread culls and probably the apple parings, and a few of those things, and preserve them separate in proper receptacles, such selective table leavings might be fed with some degree of safety to pigs, but that is just exactly what you can not do in collecting garbage in a public way in a city. It is thrown into cans and mixed up with all kinds of refuse, dirt, and filth, and can not be kept sanitary.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Hoover will not permit you to use that for feeding swine, will he?

Mr. ROBBINS. I have not seen any of Mr. Hoover's late edicts on that; he prescribes the bill of fare for men, not pigs.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman, in talking of an appropriation, this does not appropriate any money. It authorizes an appropriation upon which you can vote at another time.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is true, but you are setting aside a sum, not to exceed $200,000, for the District Commissioners of the District of Columbia to use, and you know how the District Commissioners use everything that Congress appropriates to them. You were the champion of the people against the profiteer. Now you are turning around to favor them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I am turning around in order to have the garbage taken out and consumed in order to keep the people from dying from disease.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am not opposed to taking out garbage, but I object most earnestly to buying pigs to eat up the garbage. There are modern methods of treating city garbage by incineration, and that is the method that should be adopted in the Capital City of this Nation. This plan not only means to waste the sum of $200,000 needed to support our gallant soldiers now fighting in France, but it is a method that will be fly breeding, disease spreading, and antiquated. This item can be stricken from the bill and not prevent the other provisions from being enforced. The promiscuous garbage of a city is an unhealthy conglomeration that even pigs can not eat.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question. Has the committee investigated any other method of handling this? For example, the city of Berlin before the war had a method by which it reduced the entire produce of garbage to a fertilizer, and it had a large farm of its own, consisting of many hundreds of acres. Have you ever investigated any other methods than this one?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No European method at all. There is a proposition here from a man who wants to take the garbage for the purpose of making alcohol, and it is perfectly feasible, too, but it came in after this bill was agreed upon.

Mr. LITTLE. It seems to me that if this committee is going to put so much in it, it should have investigated the new methods.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman that the committee is undertaking to provide a means by which the garbage may be disposed of. It is an emergency case, and unless it is done when the 1st of July comes along they will have no means unless you provide a bill.

Mr. LITTLE. Why did you not do it six months ago?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. As I said a few moments ago, when the time came for letting the bids the contractor, who has disposed of the garbage at $69,000, put in a bid of $147,000, and now will not bid at all, and neither will anybody else.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Are they using pigs now?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No. The man who takes away the garbage now uses it in his own way.

Mr. ROBBINS. Did your committee investigate the question of an incineration plant to destroy the garbage by burning?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; but I think that is considered too wasteful to be thought of.

Mr. LITTLE. The modern method is to use it scientifically for some beneficial purpose. Instead of incinerating it, you can use it for fertilizer. The city of Manchester uses it for fertilizer and ships it out, or did a few years ago. In Kansas City, Mo., they fed it to the hogs. A gentleman had a contract, and he did pretty well. I was employed as an attorney in a lawsuit for him, in which the matter was quite thoroughly discussed, and I never heard of it making any hog sick or having any bad result. I was a little surprised that I did not hear of it; but I did not. I thought I would hear something of that kind. In China and Japan the refuse of towns and cities is always utilized as a fertilizer. To waste that product would be considered very foolish. It is the most valuable product of many cities. Scientifically handled, reduced to a liquid fertilizer, the city of Berlin, if my memory serves me, did, and perhaps still does, fertilize a farm as large as the city, which she owned, with much profit. We should have begun this discussion, or the committee should, long since, and should be prepared to use the very best modern methods. I am getting tired of committees waiting till the last minute and rushing through important matters under a fire alarm.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. LOBECK. Gentlemen, this is a serious question, and, so far as I am concerned, I am going to vote for this bill. I looked into this garbage question when I was on the District Committee some years ago. We authorized an expenditure of $10,000 on a resolution here to look up the matter of garbage disposal, and a report to Congress was made by a gentleman who was brought here from a city in Ohio, where he had constructed a reduction plant, and in that report he stated that different methods of disposal of garbage could be employed either by incineration, by which power, heat, and light could be generated, or dispose of garbage by reduction, and by which the commissioners would be enabled to sell grease and fertilizer, and so on. The cost of the different methods was stated to be about even. The methods used in England to-day or in any community or in any State that has looked into it for any considerable time can be investigated and studied. The best possible way, to my mind, to reduce garbage in order to take care of health is the incinerating method, but I do not care which method is used. If the District of Columbia, through its Committee on the District or through the Committee on Appropriations of this House, had taken the matter in hand four or five years ago when this engineers' report was brought to the attention of Congress we would not now face a condition that may cost this District of Columbia a tremendous lot of money and possibly result in providing a very poor way for the disposal of garbage.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOBECK. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why do we not resort to the incinerating process now?

Mr. LOBECK. Well, it would take some time to construct the plant, either if a first-class reduction plant or an incinerating plant were decided upon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I notice that this bill proposes to appropriate in all $620,000. That is a very large sum, I will say, for the District of Columbia, comparing it with other cities. In some of the cities the removal and disposal of garbage pays for itself and gives a profit to the contractor. I think that was the case in New York City some years ago.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The hearings that were held show that there was no city in the United States where it was paying.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some years ago we had some evidence here in the House as to one of the cities, where money was being paid for the privilege of removing the garbage, but this is a little old-fashioned method. Of course, live stock disposes of garbage on the farm. There is no disputing that question. But it seems to be a primitive method to resort to, and in this city it would involve a very large expense. If you are going to go into an undertaking of that kind, why not make it a permanent undertaking at once?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, the limit of debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. LOBECK. I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Nebraska may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Nebraska may proceed for two minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. LOBECK. I asked for five minutes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman ought to have five minutes. He was interrupted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOBECK. It is regrettable that the District of Columbia, the Capital of the Nation, is going back to ante bellum methods, methods that are a hundred years old; going back to a method that no respectable city of this country of 50,000 inhabitants and over would resort to. That is what this bill means; but we have got to vote for it, owing to the conditions here. If Congress, through its District Committee or its Committee on Appropriations, had acted on the report of the engineer on which we had spent $10,000, we would have been prepared to take care of the situation on the 1st of July this year. That is what that resolution intended to do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOBECK. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman will recollect that the House passed an appropriate bill and sent it over to the Senate, and it died there.

Mr. LOBECK. I know it died there. I said that Congress had not acted.

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the gentleman realize that the condition with which we are confronted is caused by the fact that the Committee on the District of Columbia never brought up this matter until recently?

Mr. LOBECK. Oh, it was brought up in 1911 and 1912, and the records are here. It was fully discussed at that time. The gentleman from Wisconsin remembers it very well. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] remembers the discussion. He is not here now. But this is the condition with which we are confronted: I do not think it will pay to buy or rent a farm and go into the hog business at this time. Hogs are worth $15 to $20 a hundred, and I do not know that you can buy stock hogs at this time of the year. You might buy them in the fall, but not when grass is green. Then, you run the risk of hog cholera. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was asked if he knew anything about raising hogs.

I have not been in the hog business for many years, but there was a time when I knew something about it, and I raised and fed and shipped as good hogs as any man in the country. I know it is a risky proposition. I am opposed to the commissioners going into the hog business. I do not believe it would be wise to do so now or any other time. I have no objection to buying this plant down in Virginia. We have got to do something. It is all right to take care of this rubbish plant out on the Benning Road, which is a disgrace to the city of Washington at this time. What the District of Columbia ought to do is to set an example to the cities of this country and have some up-to-date method to take care of the garbage of this city. It can be done if Congress will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not know that this alternative provision will ever be accepted if it becomes a law, but it is an undeniable fact that since they have been vaccinating hogs they no longer die from cholera. On my farm I never had a hog die since we have been practicing vaccination.

Mr. LOBECK. That is so. I want to say that I raised and fed hogs for years without inoculation and luckily did not have hog cholera among my hogs, but this cholera cure from the Agricultural Department does not always give good results, although I may add that I know of good results when the remedies proposed by the Agricultural Department have been utilized.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$10,000."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ROBBINS) there were—ayes 15, noes 40.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$50,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania moves to amend page 5, line 15, by striking out "$200,000" and inserting "$50,000."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word or two on this proposition. We are going back to early methods, and very crude methods at that, of disposing of the garbage of a great city. If we are going into the business of garbage disposal as a municipal proposition, why not go into it right? This is the Nation's Capital and we ought to be up to date. We could construct an incinerating plant and put it under the direction of the commissioners, apparently, with the money that is appropriated in this bill for experimental purposes. We should start right. I have moved to strike out $200,000 and insert $50,000 because I do not believe we ought to go into the wholesale poultry and cattle business through the District commissioners. We ought to be businesslike in this matter, involving the health of the Capital City of this Nation, and not do it in a doubtful way or by halves.

Mr. SLOAN. The greatest source of losses of hogs now, as demonstrated at the various packing establishments, is not cholera, but tuberculosis, and the largest source of tuberculosis in hogs is garbage and that which accompanies garbage, the rejected milk of dairies, creameries, and so on. I have made considerable investigation of this subject. Congress has made an appropriation for the purpose of reducing and finally eradicating tuberculosis, of which, as I say, the most growing source in hogs is through feeding them garbage. That is the undisputed evidence of all the men who have given testimony before the committee, the scientists and all who discussed this matter. So if you buy hogs for the purpose of feeding them garbage, you are entering a dangerous field and what will be an unprofitable business.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word before my time expires. I thank the gentleman for his support, but I did want to say that this is an experimental proposition and we ought not to go into it wholesale. If you are going to try out the pig, live-stock, and poultry business, let us begin in a small way and use $50,000 instead of $200,000.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will permit me, this is purely an authorization, and I believe that the Appropriations Committee will go into every phase of it before it makes an appropriation. Does not the gentleman think he can trust the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am willing to trust the Appropriations Committee. I was willing to trust the District Committee, but it has brought in a bill that is not altogether satisfactory. Does not the gentleman believe that we should strike out this appropriation for pigs, live stock, and poultry and put it into an incinerating plant? I think we could get one started for $200,000.

Mr. GARNER. I am not enamored with the proposition to go into the business of raising pigs myself, but I think the Appropriations Committee will thrash it out in all its details.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So far as the pigs are concerned, it is purely a socialistic proposition. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, it might be interesting to gentlemen of the House to know what the commissioners say about this proposition, and incidentally it is a condition that faces the people of the District and not a theory. This incinerating plant, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has spoken, was recommended several years ago by the commission which the gentleman from Nebraska spoke of, and the reason why the District Commissioners do not recommend building it at this time is because it would be absolutely impossible to erect it by the time the contract for the disposal of garbage in the District expires, namely, the 30th of June.

Another reason is because of the abnormal cost of putting up such a plant at this time. The commissioners recommend this proposition of feeding hogs as one of three different ways which may be adopted. It does not necessarily follow that because this is put in the bill as one of the alternatives for the disposition of garbage that the commissioners will adopt it.

Let me read one or two sentences from the letter of the commissioners to the chairman of the committee recommending this bill:

This method was represented to be the most satisfactory and the most economical. It was set forth that the cost of the necessary plants and equipment would be $885,900. Under present abnormal conditions this cost would be increased to about $1,200,000. Even if sufficient time were available to provide for such plants it is believed that the present excessive cost would not justify the adoption of this course of action.

The advisability of adopting temporary expedients is believed to be clearly indicated. If satisfactory arrangements can not otherwise be made, it should be within the power of the commissioners to conduct any or all of the operations incident to the services under consideration as municipal functions. The granting of such power is the purpose of the proposed legislation. Such authority or power should be obtained at the earliest possible moment in order that adequate and timely preparations may be made.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Michigan and the other discussion here bears out what I said privately some time ago, that when you begin to dig around in this bill you will find that there is a little garbage in the bill. This matter of jumping the thing through this evening in a slipshod way ought not to go on, because when you look at section 9 it means to let the farmers come in with a tin wagon or anything of that sort and take out what garbage they want. The necessity of this bill is 30 days away, when you are going to need the money, and if this bill is so important, we can attend to the garbage plant later. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to make an explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has made a point of no quorum and no business can be transacted until after that matter is decided. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having under consideration the bill H. R. 10613, found itself without a quorum, that the roll was called and 199 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he handed in the names of the absentees to be entered in the Journal.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order at this time to move to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The House automatically goes back into the committee. The Chair made up his mind a long time ago, after he got caught once, never to recognize anybody in this situation for anything. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its sitting.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I hope that no motion of that kind will prevail. There is no need to try to kill a good bill by filibustering.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and the motion is clearly in order.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 59, noes 59.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania and Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 63.

So the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$50,000."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 46, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That every person, corporation, association, or institution in the District of Columbia, under such rules and regulations as the commissioners may prescribe, may transport in closed metal containers from the place of origin to places outside of the District of Columbia any refuse, including meat, bread, and vegetables, not in a decayed or decomposed condition, to be fed to poultry, pigs, or other live stock at any place where such feeding is not prohibited by law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph be now closed.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that motion is not now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order until debate has been had.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If gentlemen will look at that section for a minute, they will see what a proposition we are opening up. It provides that every person, corporation, association, or institution in the District of Columbia, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed, may collect garbage. That is the kind of system they have in villages of about two or three hundred inhabitants, where the farmers can come in there with their wagons, under some sort of an arrangement that might be made, and go down to the hotels, load up what stuff they want, and simply take that old, worn-out, repudiated, haphazard system of collecting garbage. Now, it is just this kind of stuff in this bill that makes it really and truly a garbage bill, and when you stop and look at that paragraph of only eight lines, think just a moment and see where you turn the matter of the collection of garbage to anybody who will haul a barrel a day instead of holding it down to a municipal collection system under one provision and one plan, and you can begin to see what this bill means. Now, I move to strike out section 9.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, section 9 is one of the best provisions of the bill. There are institutions in this city that have meat and bread scraps left on their tables which they themselves desire to haul out in sealed containers to feed to hogs, to their own hogs, on their own farms—Providence Hospital is one of them—and under the law as it stands to-day they can not do it. I say they ought to have the right to do it. They should feed the bread and meat scraps on the table that have never gone to the garbage can, which, under present laws, can not be hauled out to their own stock, and under the provisions of the bill it can be done. It is one of the best provisions of the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I see by this paragraph it is to be done under such rules and regulations as the commissioners may prescribe, so it is not a haphazard system at all.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Does the gentleman contend that stuff from this hospital ought to be used to feed to hogs?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If it is fed to human beings it is certainly good enough to be fed to hogs.

Mr. MEEKER. Diseased human beings?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Diseased human beings do not eat that which is left on the table and nobody else does.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman allow me to make a unanimous-consent request for permission to extend my remarks?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. ROBBINS. On this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10613 and had directed him to report it back to the House without amendment and with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MEEKER. I make the point there is no quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman had not been recognized for anything.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wants to get it straight. Does the gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. MEEKER. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But the gentleman was not recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Missouri was within his rights and will count.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, before the announcement of the result I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal and the disposal of matter on the Speaker's table.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. THOMAS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. Will it be in order to move that the bill and all amendments thereto be laid on the table?

The SPEAKER. You can not do anything unless you have a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. If we have a quorum, will that be in order?

The SPEAKER. Why, of course, if you get a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS. All right.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and twenty-six gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. What about my unanimous-consent request?

The SPEAKER. You can not have a unanimous-consent request without a quorum.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves a call of the House.

Mr. MEEKER. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that the House adjourn. The motion to adjourn is next to the highest motion that can be made in the House.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MEEKER. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 76.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

A quorum failing to appear, the following took place:

The SPEAKER. One hundred and seventy-four Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Speaker issue warrants for the arrest of the absentees, and instruct the Sergeant at Arms to bring them to the bar of the House.

Mr. MEEKER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I make the point of order that the motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the Speaker issue warrants for the arrest of the absentees, and instruct the Sergeant at Arms to bring them to the bar of the House.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MEEKER. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes 33.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Is that in order under the present circumstances, right while the yeas and nays are being called, and in the middle of a roll call? There is but one motion in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MEEKER] demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. QUIN. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. QUIN. There was a motion pending, and it failed to develop a quorum, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] made a motion that these men be arrested and a quorum brought in here.

The SPEAKER. Ordinarily the yeas and nays are called simply for the purpose of verification of the vote, and the Chair thinks a Member has a right to the yeas and nays. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. FOSTER. No, Mr. Speaker, they have not a sufficient number.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of taking this vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-five gentlemen have risen; not a sufficient number.

Mr. ROGERS. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed to taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-five is a sufficient number in this House. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What was the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky?

The SPEAKER. To have the Speaker issue a writ or warrant for absent Members, to bring them in.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It does not take a quorum of the House to bring in the absentees.

The SPEAKER. No; it does not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then the point was made that no quorum was present. It does not require a quorum.

The SPEAKER. That was not the point.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I misunderstood the situation.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers as to whether there was an insufficient number.

Mr. WALSH. That is not in order.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is clearly dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is. The Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion that the Speaker issue his warrant to bring in the absentees.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 116, nays 33, answered "present" 1, not voting 280, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant at Arms will prepare his writ and the Speaker will sign it.

Subsequently,

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, and that the previous question be ordered upon the bill under consideration. If I can get that agreement, why, I shall be very glad indeed to move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I can not get unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. No. When you have no quorum present you can not do anything except the things that have direct reference to the call of the House and the obtaining of a quorum. It does not take a quorum to do anything necessary to be done to secure the presence of a quorum. Outside of that, nothing can be done, not even permission to extend remarks in the RECORD. A motion to adjourn is in order. That is in order at any time.

Subsequently,

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. OVERSTREET) there were—ayes 32, noes 65.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the yeas and nays. [After counting] Fourteen Members, not a sufficient number, seconding the demand. The yeas and nays are refused, and the House refuses to adjourn.

Subsequently,

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I make the point of order that that is dilatory.

Mr. THOMAS. Dilatory nothing! This is the first time I ever made the motion to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I make the point of order that that is dilatory. There has been no intervening business.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, no intervening business can take place in the absence of a quorum. I suggest that it is not dilatory to repeat a motion to adjourn after we have waited a reasonable time and no quorum has developed.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a suggestion and take the sense of those present. We have a gentleman's agreement that this bill shall be taken up in the morning. As I understand, under parliamentary law unanimous consent can not be granted, because we can transact no business in the absence of a quorum. There may be a gentleman's agreement. I understand that any Member who is now absent might come in and object to it; but I assume that no gentleman who is absent and who is relieved from being brought from his home in contempt of the House for being absent without leave will object to an agreement made among the gentlemen who are present taking care of his interests; and I suggest that a gentleman's agreement be made that this bill shall be taken up to-morrow after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. CRISP took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I want to supplement what the gentleman from Illinois has said. Of course, in the chair the Speaker can not talk about gentlemen's agreements. There is a moral public sentiment in this House that no Member can afford to ignore. If the Members here present enter into a gentlemen's agreement, it does not become any part of the record, but, of course, no one that is here will raise a point of order about it, and no man who is not here can afford to do it, because inquiry would be made as to why he was not here. That is the truth about it. It is perfectly apparent that we are not going to get a quorum unless we stay here all night. If it was an important question, on which the Government depended, Members would be willing to stay here all night. The suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] is entirely right, and with his permission I ask those here to enter into a gentlemen's agreement that to-morrow morning, as soon as the Journal is read and business on the Speaker's table is transacted, the previous question shall be ordered and this bill voted on. If there is any objector, let him stand forth.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, with that suggestion I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 8 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 23, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

We ask these blessings for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3132) to amend section 2171 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to naturalization, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BURNETT, Mr. SABATH, Mr. RAKER, Mr. HAYES, and Mr. JOHNSON of Washington managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3476) to authorize the extension of a spur track or siding from the existing lines of railroad in the District of Columbia across First Street NE., between L and M Streets, to the buildings occupied by the field medical supply depot of the Army, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 9784. An act incorporating patrol drivers into the Metropolitan police department of the District of Columbia;

H. R. 10891. An act to amend and reenact an act for the establishment of a probation system for the District of Columbia; and

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 4292) to conserve the gold supply of the United States; to permit the settlement in silver of trade balances adverse to the United States; to provide silver for subsidiary coinage and for commercial use; to assist foreign governments at war with the enemies of the United States; and, for the above purposes, to stabilize the price and encourage the production of silver, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I present a telegram, in the nature of a memorial, relative to Senate bill 3910, which provides penalties for national banking associations who charge illegal rates of interest on loans, notes, or discounts, and so forth, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MILAN, TENN., April 1½, 1918.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

In behalf of a great number of small national banks that have not sufficient volume to justify continuing in business at the legal rate in Tennessee, we urgently beg your opposition to Owen bill, Senate No. 3910. These small banks exercise the most usual function in finance in this country, financing things at the very source where all our real prosperity originates, and they should have full consideration in fixing interest rates. Minimizing earnings inevitably results in inefficiency. The things the bank officer must buy are higher than ever before, with prices fixed in many cases by the Government, and unless banks are allowed reasonable earning can't pay salaries sufficient to enable officers to make both ends meet, and result is inefficiency, of temptation to speculation, outside dabbling, or speculation.

FRED COLLINS.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I present a telegram, in the nature of a memorial, from the board of governors of the Chattanooga Manufacturers' Association, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., April 19, 1918.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
Continental Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

We earnestly request you vigorously oppose Overman bill pending in Senate unless it be amended to exempt Interstate Commission from provision. People have been over 30 years securing protection now afforded by this commission, and anything affecting their functions or tenure of office will be a public calamity. We hope to have your hearty support of this position.

BOARD OF GOVERNORS OF THE CHATTANOOGA MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
By O. J. MAHONY, President.

Mr. MCKELLAR presented a petition of sundry citizens of Springfield, Tenn., praying that Congress fix the price of the 1918 wheat crop at $2.50 per bushel, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MCLEAN presented petitions of sundry citizens of New Britain, Farmington, Deep River, and Willimantic; of the Equal Franchise League, of Stamford, and of the Woman's Suffrage Party, of Middle Haddam, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the executive board of the Connecticut Federation of Churches, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COLT. I present a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[S. 152. Mr. Kane, of Narragansett.]

Whereas the Legislature of Rhode Island at its last session passed the presidential suffrage bill; and
Whereas equal suffrage has been indorsed by the President of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be requested to vote for the equal suffrage amendment; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President and Vice President of the United States and to the Representatives of our State in the Senate of the United States.

LABOR CONDITIONS ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask that the report on the Mooney dynamite cases in San Francisco, submitted by President Wilson's Mediation Commission, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the request, and what is the document?

The SECRETARY. Report on Mooney dynamite cases in San Francisco, submitted by President Wilson's Mediation Commission, taken from the Official Bulletin of Monday, January 28, 1918.

Mr. SMOOT. We have had that sent all over the United States already. I can not say how many tons of paper have been used in it, because I have not figured it up. I do not think the Senator ought to ask now to encumber the RECORD with it. All that matter has been sent broadcast over the United States already.

Mr. PHELAN. In an address made to the Senate yesterday by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], as I recollect, there was a reflection made upon the judicial processes of the courts of California. This report, made by the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Wilson, and several other gentlemen appointed by the President, vindicates the courts of California, because the report holds that the regularity of the proceedings was unimpeached and that the very general protest which has been made against the findings of the court and jury and the conviction and condemnation of Mooney was due to the fact that subsequent to the trial certain evidence developed impugning the character of a witness.

I do not desire to address the Senate on the subject unless I am compelled to do so, but inasmuch as this official report vindicates the judicial processes of the State of California, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD by way of an answer to the Senator from Washington and for general public information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I listened carefully to every word the Senator from Washington uttered in his address yesterday. I did not hear one intimation of censure against the courts of California, and I do not believe there is a word which could be construed in all that he said yesterday as a reflection upon the courts of California. It seems to me that it would be an utterly useless waste of money. I know if the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] were here he would object to it, and I shall object to the printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California to print the report in the RECORD. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask for a division.

On a division, the motion was rejected.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I merely desire to say that I came into the Senate just as the Senator from California made his statement in reference to some remarks that I made yesterday on the subject of a certain judicial trial which occurred in the State of California. The Senator from California is mistaken in his statement that I reflected upon the judicial processes of the courts of the State of California.

On the contrary, Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Senator from California has made that assertion, I will ask the Senator from California to repeat the particular word that he claims I used reflecting upon the courts of California. If I reflected upon the judicial processes of that State, the Senator from California will undoubtedly be able to cite the language which I used.

I am just informed that one statement the Senator from California made was that I impeached the courts of California. I should like him to point out the language in which I impeached the courts of that State.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just one moment. Before sitting down I want to say that the truth of the case is that instead of reflecting upon the judicial processes of the courts of California, the entire tenor and purport and meaning and effect of my remarks was a defense of the judicial processes of the State of California and of the protection and security of the courts of that State and all the other States of the Union.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I believe I did state it was my recollection that in the remarks of the Senator from Washington there was a reflection upon the judicial processes of the courts of California. This was an error. I may have received that impression from the general comment which has been made throughout the country by the press, especially the labor press at home and abroad, concerning the judicial processes of the courts of California. A false statement, the basis of the attacks, was given out and sent widespread throughout the country by an organization formed for the purpose of raising funds for the defense of Mooney and his associates, and——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California declines to yield.

Mr. PHELAN. In that statement it was clearly shown, not only in the body of the text but in the headlines, that a great judicial or legal outrage had been committed. Here are the headlines, on the title page:

Justice raped in California—Story of the San Francisco so-called bomb trials, wonderfully illustrated, showing how five of labor's "best and purest" are being framed up for the gallows by enemies of organized labor. (Published by the Tom Mooney molders' defense committee.)

The courts of California disposed of the matter, and, on appeal, held, by a decision made only last week, that there was nothing irregular; that there was no reversible error whatever in the proceedings of the court; that therefore the appellate court had no jurisdiction; and that the only recourse was to the executive—that is to say, the governor of California—for pardon or reprieve. It is the same kind of justice that every accused person is accorded.

Under those circumstances, the President of the United States having been informed, by a commission appointed by himself and headed by the Secretary of Labor, that material testimony had developed after the courts had disposed of the matter, he made appeal to the governor of California, as I understand it—the matter has not been made of record yet—to grant a respite in order that this man, concerning whose conviction a doubt had been created in the minds of so many people, be given an opportunity by a new trial to establish the truth or falsity of the charges against him.

I do not for a moment desire, even by intimation, to convey to the Senate that in my belief this man is innocent of the crime of which he is charged.

As the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] said yesterday, he is "a very unworthy person"; he has been engaged in the business of illegally using dynamite; he was the editor of a paper, the Blast, an advocate of violence and direct action, and when two such papers in the Eastern States were suppressed, he in his paper, the Blast, threatened the President of the United States with assassination. That was in March, 1916; and yet the President of the United States, in view of radically conflicting opinion, in view of the condemnation, which has been very general in the labor world—not, I will say, by the Senator from Washington but by ignorant and misinformed persons—of the courts of California and of the whole circumstances surrounding the case, asked the governor of California that a respite be given, in order that not only Mooney might have an opportunity to exculpate himself, if possible, but that the reputation of the United States of America throughout the world might be vindicated as treating with utmost fairness men accused of crime. This report says that the trial was fair, and the American judicial processes always favor the prisoner under the established practice. Listen to this extract from that report:

It is familiar to students of jurisprudence that no system of criminal administration in the world hedges such safeguards around an accused as does an American trial. The conviction, in other words, was based on evidence narrowly confined to the specific issues. Furthermore, proof of guilt had to be established beyond a reasonable doubt and established to the unanimous satisfaction of a jury of 12 persons selected from among the people. Conviction by an American jury is guilt determined by a very democratic institution. There is no question but that the jury acted in good faith upon the evidence as it was submitted. It is because of subsequent developments that doubt is based upon the justice of the convictions.

I think it is only right that the Senate and the country should know by this report that the trial was perfectly fair, and when the President intervenes——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. And here, I will say, Mr. President, that the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] by implication condemned the President of the United States for intervening—that is, in his speech—when the President of the United States intervenes, it is only fair, I say, to the Senate and to the people of the United States and of the world to know that those safeguards which we throw around trial by jury have been preserved even by the President of the United States exceeding, if you please, out of excess of caution, in the interests of humanity and justice, for the vindication of our courts and institutions, what might appropriately be called his proper jurisdiction. He has no power in the case except the influence of his counsel.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I merely wish to suggest to the Senator from California that my colleague also read that very statement in his speech on yesterday.

Mr. PHELAN. The statement which I have just read?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. I am very glad that I have reinforced it by reading it again in connection, not with the criticism of the President of the United States, but in vindication of his humanty and sense of justice.

It is not for us to try this case in the Senate of the United States. Both the junior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and myself had been asked to bring the matter up as long ago as last summer for the purpose of having a congressional investigation into these things, but we have refrained from doing so, because the courts of California are quite sufficient to take care of criminal cases, and in case evidence is introduced after the court has adjourned and the matter has been adjudicated, there is still the appeal to the Executive; and because the President of the United States has seen fit to invoke by his recommendation the power of the executive of California by suggesting that he give this man a new trial—not to satisfy, perhaps, any doubt in his mind, or in my mind, or in your mind—but to vindicate in the eyes of the world at a period like this, when labor is restless and suspicious, the fact that there is no attempt to "railroad" men to jail.

This story has attained international proportions; it went as far as Russia, I am told, and seriously affected the negotiations that were conducted by the commission which was sent by the United States in order to placate the Russian people and to bring them to a proper understanding of the rights and obligations of free citizenship; it was hurled in their teeth that in the State of California, in the United States of America, there was a despotism more repulsive than that which was ever exercised by the Czars of the Russias. In view of this fact, it seems to me that the Senate should permit an official report made by the commission appointed by the President of the United States to be introduced in its RECORD. The report finally said—and with this I will conclude—

Your commission therefore respectfully recommends in case the Supreme Court of California should find it necessary (confined as it is by jurisdictional limitations) to sustain the conviction of Mooney on the record of the trial, that the President use his good offices to invoke action by the governor of California and the cooperation of its prosecuting officers to the end that a new trial may be had for Mooney, whereby guilt or innocence may be put to the test of unquestionable justice. This result can easily be accomplished by postponing the execution of the sentence of Mooney to await the outcome of a new trial, based upon prosecution under one of the untried indictments against him.

That is the gist of the matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the report of what commission has the Senator from California read?

Mr. PHELAN. The President's Mediation Commission, and consists of the following gentlemen: Secretary of Labor W. B. Wilson, chairman; J. L. Spangler; E. P. Marsh; Verner Z. Reed; John H. Walker; Felix Frankfurter, secretary and counsel; Max Lowenthal, assistant secretary.

I may say, Mr. President, that when the famous Rigall letter was published, I, in common with most men, believed that Oxman, one of the principal witnesses, had been guilty of subornation of perjury, but he was tried by a California court and jury, and after a very short time—a few hours—the jury returned a verdict of not guilty. The whole structure of the condemnation of the proceedings resulting in the conviction of Mooney was based upon the supposed subornation of perjury by the witness Oxman.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PHELAN. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. In the interest of accuracy I desire to ask a question. The Senator from California has just made the statement that Oxman was tried and acquitted. I did not have the pleasure of hearing the speech made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] yesterday, but I have read the most of it in the RECORD; and, as I now recall, his statement was to the effect that this alleged offense of Oxman was inquired into by a grand jury, and that the grand jury failed to indict. What is the fact about it?

Mr. PHELAN. Oxman was tried by criminal court—the superior court of San Francisco—and was acquitted by a jury after the grand jury refused to indict, but he was held by a justice of the peace on information. On personal inquiry, I was informed by members of the bench and bar of California that Oxman was an ignorant man, who actually witnessed the explosion, who wrote that night to his wife in an interior Oregon town bearing upon that fact. Through that means it was ascertained that Oxman was an eye witness of the event. The prosecuting attorney endeavored to induce him to come to San Francisco and testify, but he refused on the ground that he did not want to be involved in a case where there was actual personal danger. However, he was finally induced to come to the city of San Francisco. He was told that his testimony should find corroboration, and he was asked if anybody was present who could corroborate his testimony, whereupon he said he thought he had recognized a man in the crowd who was from his old residence in Illinois, and that he would endeavor to get him to corroborate him. Then, he wrote this letter, which on its face is so incriminating, asking that a man, who was not present, come to San Francisco and testify. That in itself was sufficient to prejudice any right-thinking man against the witness Oxman; and yet—and, as I have said, I am not familiar with the testimony in that case—he was tried for subornation of perjury and promptly acquitted, because, I believe, it was demonstrated that he did it out of ignorance; that he did not do it with any willful or criminal intent and that it was believed he actually saw what he described. It has, however, poisoned the minds of the world and the country against the judgment of that court and the finding of that jury, which at the time had no knowledge of the Rigall letter.

Of course, his associate in the dynamite crime, as alleged, had previously been convicted without the testimony of Oxman, and it is contended by those who believe in upholding the conviction by the court that the Oxman testimony was not therefore necessary. However, the matter is involved in so much doubt that I think the findings contained in the report of the commission are sound, or at any rate suggest a wise and prudent policy; that the President was justified, based upon this report and general information, to ask that a reprieve be granted, not that the man be given his freedom, but that he be given an opportunity by a new trial to demonstrate, with or without the testimony of Oxman, his innocence or his guilt.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is one point I do not clearly understand. The Senator from California has just stated that the President requested the governor of California to secure a new trial. Does the governor of California, under the constitution of the State, have the power to grant new trials?

Mr. PHELAN. The governor of California, under the constitution, has no such power, but by granting a reprieve, or, in the language of the report, "by postponing the execution of the sentence of Mooney by such reprieve," he could be tried upon other counts. He was tried upon one count, the killing of 1 individual; there were 10 killed. So he could be tried for substantially the same crime upon other counts, if a reprieve were granted.

Mr. CUMMINS. The request, then, by the President was for a reprieve or a commutation of sentence?

Mr. PHELAN. I have said that the request is not a matter of record, nor have I seen the language which the President used. Suffice it to say that the President made a request of the governor, but the governor has not yet seen fit to publish the request of the President. It is a matter of general information and not of record.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rather gathered from the remarks of the Senator from California that the President had asked the governor of California to grant or to secure a new trial, and that seemed to me to be so out of harmony with the general powers of governors of the various Commonwealths that I was moved to ask the question which I did.

Mr. PHELAN. I trust the Senator understands now that the request probably was for a reprieve, in order that a retrial might be had on another count.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that the Senator from California does not know what the request was.

Mr. PHELAN. I have quoted the language of the report, and the presumption is that the President followed the recommendation of the report. I think that that is a very safe presumption.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. If I understood correctly the statement of the Senator a moment ago, it was that Mooney could be tried upon other counts in the indictment. If the defendant was tried upon an indictment containing several counts and was found guilty on only one count, it amounted to an acquittal on all the other counts, he can not possibly be tried again in any court of the land.

Mr. PHELAN. I submit that that is a question of law, and the lawyers advise that a trial can be had under other courts without putting the culprit again in jeopardy. I understand that a man accused of a capital crime can not be put twice in jeopardy for the same offense, but it is a matter of legal construction that a trial on a separate count charging the murder of another individual is not construed to mean putting the defendant twice in jeopardy for the same crime.

Mr. President, the fate of Mooney is a matter of indifference, because he is known to be a dynamiter; but the United States is very jealous of its laws, and, no matter how despicable a man may be, he can not be condemned for a specific crime unless he is guilty. Even in labor circles, I am informed, there is no sympathy whatever for Mooney the man, whom they regard, in common with others, as a very dangerous citizen on account of his previous record which is well understood; but labor has become unduly exercised about this case because of local conditions which, if known to you, would be very illuminating. In San Francisco, it was alleged by the labor-union organizations, which are very strong, that the merchants had organized for the purpose of destroying their unions and making the town one of the "open shop." The resulting bitterness and antagonism was very great, so that when Mooney, who was for 16 years a member of the molders' union, was accused of this crime, the labor unionists took the ground that he was to be made a victim, because of his labor unionism, and was to be punished to satisfy the vindictive spite of another class of citizens. Nothing was further from the truth. I believe that Mooney and his associates were victims of their own cupidity, and that they had been bribed by German money as a part of the German propaganda to perpetrate this crime, and prevent us from preparing for war. I think the evidence introduced yesterday in the address of the Senator from Washington very clearly showed that this widespread propaganda reached even the shores of the Pacific coast. It was universal in its activity, and there is going on in California now the celebrated trial of the Hindus, accused of conspiracy to overthrow the English Government in India. In the evidence there adduced it appears clearly that the German consul in San Francisco, Mr. Bopp, was the head and center of the activities of the German propaganda on the Pacific coast.

I regret very much, in common, I am sure, with all Senators, that the labor interests of the country should have a misconception of this case and the causes that led up to the accusation and condemnation of Mooney. The President, however, has advised the governor to silence all doubts. I have just seen a copy of his letter, which I beg to submit in order to complete the record, and if it serves to vindicate the law and establish in the minds and hearts of men a greater love for our institutions and respect for the courts, it shall have served a greater purpose than the mere punishment of an isolated criminal:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 22, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM D. STEPHENS,
Governor, Sacramento, Cal.

MY DEAR GOV. STEPHENS: Will you permit a suggestion from me in these troubled times which perhaps justify what I should feel hardly justifiable in other circumstances?

The suggestion is this: Would it not be possible to postpone the execution of the sentence of Mooney until he can be tried upon one of the other indictments against him, in order to give full weight and consideration to the important changes which I understand to have taken place in the evidence against him?

I urge this very respectfully, indeed, but very earnestly, because the case has assumed international importance and I feel free to make the suggestion because I am sure that you are as anxious as anyone can be to have no doubt or occasion of criticism of any sort attach itself to the case.

With the very best wishes for the New Year,

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. As I read the remarks of the Senator from Washington, made yesterday, he expressed the view that the record, independent of the testimony of the witness Oxman, showed the guilt of the accused beyond the existence of a reasonable doubt. Has the Senator from California examined that record to such an extent as to justify his expressing an opinion as to whether the record showed the guilt of the defendant independent of the testimony of Oxman?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not ask the Senator to yield. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the issue before the Senate at present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order of business is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I demand the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

Mr. PHELAN. It is not in order, then, for me to answer the Senator from Ohio?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing is in order at this time except the presentation of petitions and memorials.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the morning business is closed.

TRIAL BY COURT-MARTIAL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before the morning business is closed I believe resolutions coming over from a previous day are the next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A resolution coming over from a previous day may be called up, so the Senate has decided.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes. I call up two resolutions that I offered yesterday, which went over at my request, without prejudice, until to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To which resolutions does the Senator refer?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Senate resolution No. 228 and Senate resolution No. 229.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state Senate resolution No. 228.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 228, submitted by Mr. BRANDEGEE on April 22, 1918, as follows:

Whereas there is pending before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs a bill (S. 4364) "to subject to trial by court-martial persons who endanger the good discipline, order, movements, health, safety, or successful operations of the land or naval forces of the United States by acting as spies in time of war in the United States, and for other purposes": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, instructed to report to the Senate whether or not, in its opinion, any of the provisions of said bill are in violation of any provision of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] requested me to send for him if this resolution came up this morning, and I have done so. Of course, no action will be taken on it until he comes into the Senate; but pending his arrival I will consume the time in making a few brief remarks.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have sent for the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. With pleasure.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Senator know how long it will take to dispose of this measure?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think about three minutes, so far as I know. I do not want to dispose of it until the Senator from Oregon arrives. I assume it will take him about three minutes to walk across the hall from his committee room.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Oregon is here.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN entered the Chamber.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is now on the floor.

Mr. President, when I offered this resolution yesterday, as I stated at the time, it was because I feared that the Committee on Military Affairs might be seriously considering a favorable report upon it, and I thought that it presented such a departure from the fundamental principles of our Constitution and Government that it would be well, as a precautionary measure, to have the judgment of the law committee of the Senate upon the constitutionality of the measure. It may be that I presumed too much in thinking that the Senate would care for the opinion of their law committee. However, be that as it may, I have seen in the public prints, since the introduction of the resolution, the statement that the President is opposed to the measure; and I have seen in the morning paper that the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs is reported to have stated that he did not care to press it under those circumstances. Of course, if he has no serious intention of pressing his bill, I do not care to subject the Judiciary Committee to the process of investigating and reporting upon its constitutionality. So I ask the Senator from Oregon if he cares to make any statement as to his intention. If he is not going to press the bill I will withdraw the resolution, because my purpose has been accomplished. If he intends to press the bill, I intend to press the resolution. I have no right to cross-examine the Senator, of course, but I ask him if he cares to make any statement that would enlighten me in the premises?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it would seem to be a work of supererogation to undertake to press a bill when the Chief Executive opposes it, in view of the situation here. The time of the Senate, the time of Congress, is too valuable to waste in useless discussion; and I feel that if the bill passed Congress it would pass by a very small majority, if it passed at all, and a veto by the Chief Executive would, of course, defeat the measure. I will say frankly to the Senator that notwithstanding the opposition of the Chief Executive, if I thought that this bill could go through by a substantial majority and could be carried over a veto, I would not hesitate to press it, because I really feel that it is absolutely necessary.

What the feeling of the committee is, I do not know. The Senator was there at the only discussion we had, and he could see the temper of the members of the committee who were present; and before I would say that it would not be pressed I should want to have the benefit of the advice of my fellow members of the committee. I have no right to say that it will not be pressed; so that I think the Senator had better press his resolution, and see what the result will be.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota with pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I think this is an unusual proceeding, and we ought not to embark upon it. What is involved in this matter is that the Judiciary Committee must pass upon the constitutionality of bills pending before another committee. I think that would be a most irregular practice. If we can insist upon having it done in one case, we can insist upon having it done in another. If the Judiciary Committee or some of its members should take it into their heads that a bill pending before the Committee on Appropriations or before the Naval Affairs Committee is unconstitutional, they could investigate it under the practice sought to be inaugurated. I think the legitimate practice in this case is to have the Committee on Military Affairs discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and refer it to the Judiciary Committee. That would bring the bill properly before the Judiciary Committee.

I can not say that I disagree with the Senator from Connecticut about the principle involved in this bill, but I protest that it is an unusual practice to have the Judiciary Committee pronounce upon the constitutionality of a bill pending before another committee and in the hands of that committee. So I say that the proper procedure in this case is to move to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the consideration of the bill, and have it referred to the Judiciary Committee. I would vote for such a motion but not for this motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I appreciate thoroughly the position of the Senator from Minnesota, and I stated so yesterday. I think his suggestion is the more logical of the two. I stated yesterday that I only refrained from moving to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of this measure and moving its reference to the Judiciary Committee, where it properly belongs, out of my high regard and respect for the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator about the importance of the question involved, but I should like to make this suggestion to the Senator from Connecticut: Does he not think that he ought to withhold his resolution until the Committee on Military Affairs has acted on this bill?

It seems to me that the Senator from Minnesota is right, that we would be embarking on a procedure that would lead to endless confusion if we should adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut at this time. It may be that the committee will never consider the bill further, and never report it, or it may report the bill adversely. It seems to me, with all due respect to the Senator from Connecticut, that he ought to wait with his resolution at least until the Committee on Military Affairs has acted, and then not press the resolution unless the committee has made a favorable report and the bill is put on the calendar. Does not the Senator think that that would be a better proceeding?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That was suggested to me yesterday, and I can not agree with the Senator that I think it would be a better proceeding. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate is the law committee of the Senate. It is composed of 18 lawyers of the Senate. Without disparagement to any lawyer on the Committee on Military Affairs, there are only a few of them there. They are just as good lawyers as those on the Judiciary Committee. I do not attempt to disparage them at all. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] are three of the most eminent lawyers in this country; yet, as I told the Senate yesterday, I attended a meeting of that committee, and while I hesitated yesterday to be "telling tales out of school," and I do not want to violate the confidence that the committee reposed in me, and I do not intend to do so, certain prominent members of that committee even after they had heard read to them the case of Ex parte Milligan, which is the leading case upon this subject, stoutly maintained that this bill was constitutional. I thought, inasmuch as this bill proposes to transfer the trial of 100,000,000 American civilian citizens from the civil courts to the drumhead court-martial, and the Committee on Military Affairs, or some of its most prominent members, were seriously considering it, it would not be taken to be an inopportune time nor an insult nor a reflection upon anybody if the Senate took the advice of its own law committee as to whether or not the bill was constitutional.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senate took an adjournment yesterday until 11 o'clock this morning in the hope that we could dispose of the housing bill. Would the Senator object to having his resolution go over without prejudice to the next morning hour?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think we can dispose of this matter in five minutes, and I should like to get it out of the way.

Mr. President and Senators, I do not care to press this resolution at all. If I had known, when I offered it, that the President of the United States was going to take the same view that I did upon this question I would not have offered it at all. The bill is dead. Everybody knows that. The committee will never report it. Perhaps some of the very Members who were strenuously in favor of it on Saturday will now turn around and oppose it, having heard "their master's voice." I certainly should oppose it to the death. I would die in my tracks, I would resign from the Senate, or be defeated on the issue, before I would vote to subject the civilian population of America to the yoke of the Army for speaking disrespectfully of the administration, or committing some one of the heinous offenses that we have defined in the espionage bill, and so forth; but I regard the danger as being over and now I withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut withdraws his resolution.

WAR AGAINST BULGARIA AND TURKEY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I now call up the next resolution that I offered, being Senate resolution 229.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the resolution.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 229, submitted by Mr. BRANDEGEE on April 22, 1918, as follows:

Whereas S. J. Res. 145, to declare a state of war between the United States of America and the Governments of Bulgaria and of Turkey, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations on April 2, 1918: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations is requested to give said resolution its early consideration and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I want to speak about one minute on this resolution.

We are at war with Germany. Germany has as her allies, bound to her and dominated by her, Austria-Hungary, Turkey, and Bulgaria. We loitered along for about a year before we dared declare war on Austria. We finally did it. To-day the Bulgarian troops are right out on the western front fighting the English, French, and American troops. The Bulgarian minister sits here in Washington, persona grata to the State Department. The other day I received a newspaper article from him—as I thought, in gross breach of diplomatic etiquette—with his visiting card pinned to it, telling how Czar Ferdinand saw no reason to have any unfriendly feeling toward America; yet his troops are in the front line fighting our boys. I think it is an outrage that this country should tolerate such a condition. Here is Turkey, slaughtering our men and slaughtering Armenians by the millions, devastating the Orient, and yet the representatives of Bulgaria and Turkey—the right and left hands of the German beast against which we are waging war—are persona grata here to our State Department, and we are conducting friendly diplomatic relations with them. I say it is not only anomalous, but it is outrageous, and will be extremely embarrassing and dangerous if this situation is kept up.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I was attracted by the statement made by the Senator from Connecticut to the effect that the Bulgarians were now on the western front. I have no personal knowledge upon that subject; but only within two or three days a Bulgarian missionary, formerly a resident of the State of Ohio, was in my office and stated to me that the Bulgarians were not on the western front, and that they had refused to go to the western front or to participate in the fighting on the western front because of their friendly feeling toward the United States.

I simply make that statement for what it is worth. I know nothing about the facts.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, of course I have not been across the line and seen them there. I have read in the newspapers that they did have regiments on the western front. As to their "friendly feeling" toward the United States, if they want to display that in a really practical way they had better get out of the German Army and stop fighting the French and English, who are our allies. That is all camouflage, Mr. President. We may as well look right through this thing, down to the bottom of it. Bulgaria can not be friendly to the United States and friendly to Germany at the same time; that is all there is to it. They are absolutely under the cloven hoof of Germany. They are not free agents. They are dominated by Germany. Their life and death depends upon the favor with which the Kaiser looks upon Czar Ferdinand, and it is a travesty and a tragedy for us to be declaring war against one of several allied powers who are waging joint war against us and maintaining friendly relations with the others.

I do not want to instruct the Foreign Relations Committee. I am a member of it myself. I am going to withdraw this resolution. I simply introduced it for the purpose of calling the attention of the country to the fact that we ought to be in this war to win the war and not to attempt to incite Czechs or Bolsheviki to revolution in the countries of our enemies. Thirteen-inch guns and American troops and vessels will win this war. We can not win it by attempting to incite riots within the lines of our enemies.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Senator say he intended to withdraw the resolution?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not do that. It seems to me that the resolution is couched in the most respectful terms possible, and the committee can not be offended if it is passed, and it ought to be passed. If there is any reason why it should not take the action suggested, the committee is able to find it and we ought to know it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then, I will not withdraw the resolution. I will let the Senate act on it. It is a resolution simply requesting the Foreign Relations Committee to give early consideration to the resolution that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] introduced April 2 to declare war upon our enemies, Bulgaria and Turkey, and to report upon it. We did give consideration to it. The only reason I dislike to press the resolution is that, being a member of the committee myself, it might be asked, Why did you not press it in committee? I am going to press it. I think the sentiment of the American people is in favor of the resolution, and I thought if I said a few words in the Senate it might induce the committee to give it earlier and more favorable consideration than though I said it in the privacy of the committee.

As I said, the committee did consider this question. I think the sentiment of the committee was in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I am not at liberty to talk publicly and entirely freely about it, but I think I can say, without violating confidence or furnishing information to the enemy, that the State Department thought, in view of certain views of its own, it was best not to act upon it at that time. So we deferred action. I think we have deferred action long enough.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. KNOX. Is it not a matter of public record that the President in his address to the joint Houses of Congress dissuaded from——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, we can not hear on this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will preserve order.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator from Connecticut manifested some indisposition toward stating why the Committee on Foreign Relations had not passed upon this resolution at the time it was presented and considered, on the ground that he did not care to disclose the action of the committee. I was asking him if it is not a fact and does not that fact appear of record that the President in his address to Congress at the time of the declaration of war upon Austria said that, while logically Turkey and Bulgaria should be included, yet there were reasons at that time why it was not thought desirable. Is not that correct?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think that is correct, Mr. President, and it supplements what I said, and what I said is still true, notwithstanding that even after the matter came before the committee, after the President had made his address to Congress, after the Senator from Utah had sent his resolution to the committee, similar advice came from the State Department. I may go that far, I think, without violating confidence.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator I do not see any reason myself, but there may be; the President or the State Department may know about it, but if there is any reason why a resolution declaring war against Bulgaria and Turkey should not be passed, the committee will be able to ascertain it, I take it, without any difficulty, and it can act accordingly and should act accordingly. If there is sufficient reason why the step should not be taken, it will be very easy to ascertain it, but we are now in an illogical position at present unless there is some sufficient reason for it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not of an unduly optimistic nature, but I have been hoping that the Committee on Foreign Relations of this Senate, which represents half of the treaty-making power of this country, and which the great American public assumes has some knowledge of foreign relations and what is going on, might get some information about what is going on abroad. Yet the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations knows no more about what is going on abroad than the Committee on Military Affairs or the Committee on Agriculture. The President is his own Foreign Relations Committee, and his own Secretary of State, and he is conducting this war in behalf of 100,000,000 people, weaving himself into a cocoon of mystery, secrecy, and silence in the top floor of the White House, and nobody but Col. House tiptoes up and down stairs, and then silently folds his tent and steals away back to New York. The Senate of the United States is in as dense ignorance about our foreign relations as the Common Council of Keokuk.

It is not right, Mr. President. Talk about taking common counsel! Talk about demanding legislative powers to coordinate the departments of this Government! The trouble is the President will not coordinate with anybody but himself. That is the trouble. The trouble is not with Congress. My God, we have gone miles further than any Congress ever dreamed of going to furnish equipment for this administration, to wage this war which we declared a year ago, and which the President has never spoken of since without holding out in his left hand a bid for some kind of a peace.

What we want are 13-inch guns and men and a realization that this country is in this war to fight and not to conduct a Bolsheviki Chautauqua circuit tea party, to drivel and snivel about humanity. You are up against Von Hindenburg. There is but one thing to talk to that man and that is power, and we have dawdled and talked for a year, mismanaging our air fleet, mismanaging our shipbuilding, mismanaging our machine guns, delaying and hoping that poor France and England would win this war for us while we elevated ourselves to the position of prince of peace and general agent of humanity. It is time we got down to a realization of this thing, Mr. President.

Now, I want to declare war against Bulgaria and Turkey. I have introduced this resolution asking the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations to give early consideration to the resolution that the Senator from Utah introduced. I do not think it is disrespectful to ask that, and I have asked for a report. I want them to report one way or another and not pigeonhole it. If we ought not to declare war against Turkey and Bulgaria let us say that we decline to declare war against them. If we ought to declare war against the powers that are fighting us and our allies, let us declare war against them. Let us come out in the open and be frank and manly about this thing, and courageous—not sneak around under a lot of camouflage and enshroud ourselves in mystery and secrecy.

I ask for a vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I think this is an ill time to pass the resolution. The Senator from Connecticut is a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. He can bring it up in the committee at any time it has a meeting. Any request on his part to have a meeting, I am sure, will be heeded. He can bring it up at any time and present the facts. In introducing the resolution when the relations with Bulgaria and Turkey are now very strained, difficulties might arise between those countries at any time, and to go into this matter hurriedly without consideration and force a report upon it is ill advised. The Senator can let the resolution go over without prejudice and bring it up at any other time. I do not know that he has ever made any motion in the Foreign Relations Committee to take it up for consideration. I can not recall that he has ever done so. He is a member of the committee and at any time when there is a meeting he can bring it up for consideration and disposition. I see no occasion for the Senate to instruct the Foreign Relations Committee at this time. I hope the Senator will follow his original judgment and let the matter go over.

The Senator talks about waging this war. The Senate adjourned yesterday until 11 o'clock to-day, instead of taking a recess, to consider a war measure. Here an hour and fifteen minutes have been consumed when the Army, the Navy, and the President, and everybody who has investigated says you can not wage this war without munitions, and you can not get munitions unless you get workmen, and you can not get workmen unless you get places to house them. I have here and have had for the last two weeks nearly a confidential report showing the condition at munition plants, navy yards, in the construction of naval vessels, saying that it is utterly impossible to conduct them unless housing is furnished. Yet for two weeks I have not been able to get consideration and passage of the bill. I can not get it passed to-day if we pass beyond the hour of 1 o'clock. I hope the Senator will let his resolution go over and give me an opportunity to take up the housing bill. The Senate adjourned yesterday and met at 11 o'clock to-day in order to dispose of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator had stopped talking, the resolution would have been out of the way by this time. I am not opposing his housing bill or any other war measure. I vote for all of them.

Mr. SWANSON. They can not be disposed of until an opportunity is given to vote on them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course not, and this resolution can not be disposed of until an opportunity is given to vote on it. If the Senator will take his seat and let us vote on the resolution, whether the vote is yes or no—I do not care which way—vote it up or vote it down.

Mr. SWANSON. I understood the Senator first said he would not press it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did.

Mr. SWANSON. Secondly he said he would, and all I ask the Senator to do in an important matter like this is not to force this discussion at this time, when the Senate really assigned the time to the consideration of a war measure to wage the present war. You can not get ammunition; you can not build destroyers; you can not construct the things necessary for the war without workmen.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is again defeating the consideration of his own measure by his oratory.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator has talked, I do not know how long.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not over 10 minutes.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator does not know how to reckon time when he is talking. The clock runs slowly when the Senator talks. All I ask, as this is an important question, is that we should not force the committee to report on it unless it thought it was wise. The Senator is a member of the committee. Let it go over without prejudice.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The resolution does not force the committee. It is a respectful request. The language is "that the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations is hereby requested to give early consideration"——

Mr. SWANSON. Has the Senator ever made a motion in the committee for the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It was taken up once and laid aside.

Mr. SWANSON. When? I do not remember. I was not present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator was not there, I was there, and I can refresh his recollection.

Mr. SWANSON. I insist that the matter should come up in the committee. The Senator is a member of the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I insist upon it here and now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I should like, being detained from the Senate, to know what the resolution of the Senator is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will read the resolution to the Senator.

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations is requested to give said resolution—

The King resolution, declaring war on Turkey and Bulgaria—its early consideration and report thereon to the Senate.

It seems to be a comparatively harmless resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to ask the Senator, repenting somewhat what the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] said, a question. I likewise am a member of the committee which depends very largely or much upon what it does to the good judgment and clear sense of the Senator himself who introduced the resolution. It seems to me that it is more or less an insinuation that the committee is not inclined——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I withdraw any insinuating purpose in it, if the Senator finds that between the lines.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Still the question remains, Why does the Senator press it?—I ask in all respect.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do it in order to bring the matter to the attention of the Foreign Relations Committee. I think if they felt that the sense of the Senate is that war ought to be declared it might hasten their action a bit. I do not want to offend the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You are not offending me in the least.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator thought there was some insinuation against the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Against the committee itself, of which the Senator is a member. I would protect the Senator from an insinuation against himself in bringing it before the Senate and giving it publicity here rather than before the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want both. I think the sentiment of this country demands war against Turkey and Bulgaria, but I do not think it is hostile or insinuating or a reflection upon the committee who have not taken action upon the resolution. We have now been at war three weeks since it was introduced and to request it to be kind enough to give it very early consideration and report one way or the other——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator knows that on notice to the chairman of the committee——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not know who the chairman is.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is the trouble. The matter could be brought before the committee. If the committee goes against the wishes of the Senate, it is subject to the rebuke of the Senate on a vote of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is not a rebuke.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Whether it is a rebuke or not, leaving that question out, it seems to me in the regular order of things in a matter of this importance when we do not know how much Americans are exposed in Turkey without knowing what would be the result of this action on the part of the Senate it should be left with the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think it could be considered to be hasty after a year of war.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There has not been a year of war between us and Turkey.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; but the Turks have been waging war against our allies and we have not been waging war against Turkey at all.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not suppose they have been waging war against our people in Turkey, and I understand there are a great number of Americans there.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. They have been at war with the British Army all through the Orient the best they could. Let the resolution be voted upon. The Senator can vote against the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not wish to be put in that attitude. There is where the Senator, it seems to me, is taking an unintentional advantage.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to take any advantage of the Senator. All the Senator has to do is to vote against the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I understand I can vote against it, and all the Senator has to do is to introduce it and ask for a vote, no matter what is said, no matter how far it was from ordinary proceedings on this floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for a vote on it. I do not know whether I shall get one or not. I admit the Senator's right to vote against it, and I think the Senator must concede my right to vote in favor of it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But I do not think the Senator has a right, being a member of the committee, to force a vote upon me or upon anybody else. A great deal more may be entering into the question than the resolution itself conveys.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know something about the question, though I did not get my information from the State Department.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Unfortunately, the Senator did not bring it before the proper committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I shall bring it before the committee even if this resolution does not pass.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I presume it is the purpose of the Senator from Connecticut to press the resolution to a vote.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to have a vote on it.

Mr. THOMAS. Then I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Henderson	Nugent	Sterling
Baird	Hollis	Overman	Sutherland
Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Owen	Swanson
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Thomas
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Thompson
Calder	Kellogg	Pittman	Tillman
Chamberlain	King	Poindexter	Townsend
Culberson	Kirby	Pomerene	Trammell
Cummins	Knox	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Curtis	Lenroot	Shafroth	Wadsworth
Dillingham	McLean	Sheppard	Walsh
Fall	McNary	Sherman	Watson
France	Martin	Shields	Williams
Frelinghuysen	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott
Gallinger	New	Smith, Ga.
Harding	Norris	Smoot

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask for the reading of the resolution upon which we are about to vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read (S. Res. 229) as follows:

Whereas S. J. Res. 145, to declare a state of war between the United States of America and the Governments of Bulgaria and of Turkey, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations on April 2, 1918: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations is requested to give said resolution its early consideration and report thereon to the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, I am ready to vote to report out this joint resolution at any time, and to report it for favorable action by this body. I have, however, some hesitancy in voting for the pending resolution, due to the fact that the joint resolution to which it refers has never been called up in the committee to my knowledge. But in voting against this resolution I do not wish it to be understood that I am opposed to a speedy report upon the joint resolution and in favor of it being passed by this body.

Mr. SWANSON and Mr. THOMAS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall vote against this resolution, because I am not sure that the time has come when we ought to decide upon the question of war upon Bulgaria and Turkey. If the Committee on Foreign Relations were ready to report and should report, and this were the time to pass upon the question, I should prefer that they should judge even that problem before action is had. It may be that I shall be ready when the committee reports to vote for war with Bulgaria and Turkey; but now I do not know, and I prefer to leave the matter with the Committee on Foreign Relations to bring it to us in the ordinary way.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have my doubts as to whether or not a motion would be in order to refer this resolution of instruction to the committee; but if it is in order I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I make the point of order that the yeas and nays having already been ordered upon the resolution, it is too late to make a motion or to do anything other than to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. Once, when I was presiding, I ruled on that question, and the Senator from Connecticut spoke very eloquently against the ruling, and the Senate overruled it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We succeeded in overruling the decision of the Chair, and I am sure we were right. If the Senator from Connecticut will merely reflect a moment, he will remember that he and I both joined vigorously in the attack upon the ruling by the Chair. The Vice President was in the chair, and we overruled him on it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have reflected vigorously, but I do not remember the incident.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can cite the incident.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona withdraw his motion?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I desire to say, it seems to me, that if there was ever a time in the history of this Government when we ought to be united upon all matters, when there should be absolutely no division, it is now. There may be the most potent reasons why the committee has not reported the joint resolution relative to a declaration of war between the United States and the Governments of Bulgaria and Turkey. The President indicated in his address that, in his judgment, the time was not ripe for such a declaration of war. He has information which we do not possess, and we might commit a most egregious blunder by precipitating even a discussion of the subject at this time. Let us trust our Commander in Chief. It seems to me that we ought not to pass the pending Senate resolution until at least it has been called up by the Committee on Foreign Relations and the matter thoroughly considered by them. For that reason I shall vote against the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. KNOX and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania first addressed the Chair, and is therefore recognized.

Mr. KNOX. Mr President, it has become very obvious—and I think we all knew it even before it was drawn to our attention this morning—that the reason the United States has not declared that a state of war exists between the United States and Turkey and the United States and Bulgaria is because the President of the United States, when he addressed the Congress last December in relation to a declaration that a condition of war existed with Austria, pointed out that, while it was logical that the same declaration should be made in respect to Turkey and Bulgaria, there were reasons why it was not expedient at that time to make the declaration. There is not any question about the action of the Committee on Foreign Relations having been suspended by reason of that fact, supplemented by additional information from the Department of State supporting more in detail that which the President had already indicated to both branches of Congress.

Now, it seems to me that a substitute can be offered to this resolution which will go directly to the point. If this resolution is passed, then the question will come before the Committee on Foreign Relations, which will take it up with the Department of State, and that department will take it up with the President. Filtered through those various channels, the matter will come back to the Senate. Then the Senate will have to act upon the information thus received. I am going to ask the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] if he will not accept this as a substitute for his resolution:

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate if there now exists any reason why the United States should not declare that a state of war exists between the United States and Turkey and the United States and Bulgaria

The President has already told us several months ago that at that time there were such reasons, but a declaration at that time was not expedient. It may be that it is expedient at this time; and, if so, and if the statement of the reasons is not incompatible with the public interest, the President will say so. If such statement should be incompatible with the public interest—and I can well imagine how such a thing could be—the President will state that there are reasons why it is not wise for him to make such disclosure.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit me, the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which the joint resolution has been referred, can see the President and secure all the information desired. The President can communicate more freely to them than he can in a public communication to Congress. I have never known the State Department or the President to refuse, upon proper inquiry from any member of the committee, a frank and full reply. It seems to me that, even before the pending resolution is passed, the proper thing would be for the Committee on Foreign Relations to confer with the Secretary of State or with the President, and ascertain the situation. I do not think the Senator will say that the President or the Secretary of State has ever failed to talk to him in the fullest, freest, and most complete way concerning any foreign affairs in regard to which he desired information. It seems to me if the Committee on Foreign Relations are desirous of considering the question, the Secretary of State will be very glad to appear, confer with them, and give to them such reasons and such information as he has fully and completely. It appears to me that the wise course to pursue is for the committee to handle this matter. The Senator from Connecticut says he brought the matter up once in committee. I can not recall any such occasion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not say I had brought it up; I said that the committee took it up.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not think the committee deserves that any reflection should be made upon it because no member of the committee has endeavored to bring this matter up, so far as I know—and I am a member of the committee and have been present at its meetings. In my opinion, to reflect on that committee as being derelict in the discharge of its duty and being recreant to the trust reposed in it is not proper treatment of the committee of which the Senator from Connecticut himself is a member.

If the Senator wants to bring the matter up, I have no doubt the chairman of the committee will call a meeting for that purpose, when the matter can be discussed and considered and full information obtained. I think that is the purpose for which the committee was created. I do not see wherein the committee has been derelict in its duty nor why it should be called upon to abdicate its functions. If the Senator from Connecticut consents to the substitution for the resolution proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I would not consent, and as the yeas and nays have been ordered I do not think the Senator from Connecticut can have control of the resolution.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the substitute I have offered for the resolution does not proceed upon the hypothesis that there has been any difficulty in getting from the State Department any information it had that it was willing to disclose, and it is usually willing to disclose information when it is not incompatible with the public interest that it be made public. The substitute resolution which I offer does not reflect at all upon the Committee on Foreign Relations. If the Senator from Virginia imagines that the Senator from Connecticut had offered a resolution that might be so construed, my proposed substitute was intended to obviate that. It is entirely proper practice; it has been done over and over again to supply the basis upon which the Senate desires to act to request from the President in this polite and respectful manner information in order that the Senate may act intelligently.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will excuse me just for one moment, I feel the weight constantly, and I am quite sure every Senator here feels the weight pressing upon him in a manner that is almost discouraging at times, that we do not know enough about the things upon which we are expected to act. The country, I can imagine, wonders, as the Senator from Connecticut said this morning, that with Bulgarian troops at or upon the line fighting with the Americans and the British and the French, why should we entertain here a minister from Bulgaria. Why should he have access to the Department of State and to the ear of the President? Why should he be received in the homes of American citizens to pick up the information that may be dropped at dinner tables and on other social occasions which may be of great value to his country's allies? Does anyone here imagine for one second that, with Bulgaria standing in the relation she does to the Kaiser to-day, such information is not going and going constantly? Why should we entertain a minister under such circumstances?

The people have a right to demand to know why we are doing it. If the reasons are overwhelming, we will continue to do it; but if good reasons do not exist we should cease doing it, and that same state of war which we have declared to exist between Germany and the United States and Austria and the United States should be declared to exist between Bulgaria and Turkey and the United States, because in making such a declaration we would only be declaring the fact.

As I said a moment ago, I was satisfied at the time the President requested that the matter should be passed over that it was wise and expedient to take his judgment and pass over it. I would be satisfied if he were to come back to-morrow and say in response to this resolution that there are reasons, and grave reasons, why a state of war should not be declared to exist to take his judgment for it, but I say the time has come when to release ourselves from the responsibility which we have no right to bear any longer, we should have this information and have it direct, and in passing this resolution we should make no reflection whatever upon the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. POMERENE, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I have not yet yielded the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not need to disclaim again, I think, any intention of reflecting upon the committee of which I have the honor to be a member—the Committee on Foreign Relations. The last thought in my mind was to reflect upon it when I made a courteous request that it should give early consideration to the measure.

Mr. President, I think the substitute proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is preferable to my own resolution. I introduced the resolution as expressing the best that I could think of to bring this matter to public attention. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] berates me for having brought this matter here publicly, as he says. Why, my God, Mr. President, this is an era of open diplomacy—no more secret diplomacy, nothing is to be done in a dark corner.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the era of pitiless publicity.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; pitiless publicity; democracy is the world issue now; and so I have not hesitated on the floor of the United States Senate to ask the Committee on Foreign Relations to please consider a resolution without thinking that I was insulting its members, myself among the number. So much for that.

I accept the substitute, if I may do so, prepared by the Senator from Pennsylvania, for I think it is wise to go to the fountainhead, and the sole fountainhead, of information on foreign relations, and to ask the President of the United States whether any reason now exists why we should not declare war upon the enemies of our friends.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has the floor. He yielded to me.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator from Pennsylvania has not the floor, for he has taken his seat.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I can yield, I yield to the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that Senators can not farm out the floor without reference to the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think so, either, Mr. President. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], thinking that he desired the floor at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. If the Senator from Ohio now desires recognition, the Chair will renew that recognition and then will recognize other Senators.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have been a good deal troubled in my own mind as to just what the attitude of this country should be with respect to Bulgaria and Turkey, particularly with respect to Bulgaria. The Senator from Pennsylvania a moment ago referred to the address of the President. I have that address before me, and this is what the President said:

> The same logic would lead also to a declaration of war against Turkey and Bulgaria. They also are the tools of Germany, but they are mere tools and do not yet stand in the direct path of our necessary action. We shall go wherever the necessities of this war carry us, but it seems to me that we should go only where immediate and practical considerations lead us and not heed any others.

I do not think there was any real occasion for the presentation of the resolution offered by the Senator from Connecticut. I feel quite sure that if that matter had been brought up in the Committee on Foreign Relations it would have received full and considerate attention; but the Senator from Connecticut saw fit to present that resolution, and he was fully within his rights when he did present it. I do not regard it as a reflection upon the committee. I do not regard it as a reflection upon any committee to have any Senator at any time present a request to the Senate with respect to matters which may be occupying the attention of the committee; but now the Senator from Pennsylvania offers a substitute, which, in substance, provides that the President shall be requested to, if not incompatible with the public interest, inform Congress whether there is or not any reason now why the Congress of the United States should not act upon this subject.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. POMERENE. For a question.

Mr. FALL. I want to ask the Senator if he thinks that the Senate of the United States would be disrespectful, acting purely and particularly within its own constitutional sphere in the matter of a declaration of war, if it requested the information directly from the President and secured it from any other source, possibly, and acted independently of the Executive in the declaration of war, if it saw fit to make it?

Mr. POMERENE. I think perhaps the Senator's question has anticipated what I am going to say upon the subject. The President has already declared that in his opinion the time had not arrived when the Congress of the United States should act upon this subject. That was on December 4, 1917. Now, after a lapse of four months, the Senator from Pennsylvania presents the same question before the Senate, asking for information. It is not as if a new subject had been broached. The last public utterance by the President upon this question was on December 4, 1917, and at that time it was his view that no action should be taken. I see no impropriety, if the Senate sees proper, in asking the President now whether the situation has changed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that if the situation had changed so that the President thought that a declaration of war should be made, he would present the matter, just as he presented the matter as to a declaration of war against Austria?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, of course that information can come from the President on his own initiative; but the fact that it may come on his own initiative is no reason why the Senate and the Congress may not be a little curious upon the subject.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be; but does not the Senator recognize that the complications of the situation are utterly unknown to us and are known to him?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if that be so, then the President can so advise us.

I simply rose to say that in my judgment the Senate could with perfect propriety adopt the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, in response to the Senator from Ohio I will state that the Senate has appointed an agency to examine as far as it can in confidence matters that can not be discussed in public, like the executive sessions of the Senate, to report upon delicate and intricate foreign matters. The Foreign Relations Committee has full power to consider the wisdom of declaring war against Bulgaria and Turkey. Up to this time no effort has been made in the committee to reach a conclusion on that question, the committee being controlled by the recommendation of the President at the time war was declared on Austria. I am not discussing the impropriety of the Senate controlling any of its agencies. I am discussing the wisdom of doing so.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if the reason why the committee have made no effort to inform itself upon this question is because the members of the committee have some information which satisfies them individually which results in nonaction of the committee, or is it just because the committee have not paid any attention to it?

Mr. SWANSON. If I recall, when the question was before the committee as to whether Turkey and Bulgaria should be included we had communications from the Secretary of State, and I recall that I had a confidential letter, and other Members were informed and reasons were given why it was thought at that time that it would not be wise to declare war against Turkey and include Bulgaria.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will recall, also, that the late chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, who since then has, unfortunately, died, read to the committee confidentially a communication from the Secretary of State.

Mr. SWANSON. I may as well state that one of the communications was from Mr. Phillips and one was from a person who had been through Turkey. On the information furnished at that time the committee was practically unanimous, as I recall—some might have objected—that it was not wise at that time to include a declaration of war against Turkey and Bulgaria. I do not recall that since then the question has been agitated or discussed, and I am confident that it has not.

The position I took in regard to the matter was this: It would seem to me that before the Senate took action—and it is manifest that there are a number of Members of the Senate who desire action—the proper course to pursue would be for the question to be brought up in the Foreign Relations Committee, send for the Secretary of State, get all the confidential communications which certainly will be given to the committee on this subject, and let the committee ascertain for itself the facts and reach a conclusion and report, if it is necessary, to the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. While the Chair has ruled that this resolution is not to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I desire to inquire whether or not a motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations would be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the resolution might be referred to the Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then when I get an opportunity I shall make such a motion.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that the President and the Secretary of State can communicate the facts more fully, more freely, and more confidentially to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as the agents of the Senate for foreign affairs, than they can in a public communication to the Senate, giving the various reasons why we should or should not declare war against Turkey and Bulgaria; and it seems to me the proper course to pursue in a delicate question like this is to give the Foreign Relations Committee an opportunity to ascertain the facts and to reach a conclusion. The Senator from Connecticut has every opportunity of bringing that matter before the committee, to get all the confidential communications that the State Department has, the views of the administration itself, and the entire relations pertaining to the situation between Bulgaria and Turkey and the United States.

As I said before, we have all seen the statement in the press dispatches—I do not know whether it is true or not—that the relations between Turkey and Bulgaria are becoming strained in connection with the division of territory. As I say, I do not know whether it is true or not. We ought to ascertain the facts in that situation before we precipitate this intricate question here for debate and discussion.

It seems to me that the proper course to pursue—and I hope the Senator from Connecticut will pursue it—would be to let this resolution go to the committee. I feel sure the committee will give him and those who favor a declaration of war against Bulgaria and Turkey a hearing. I am frank to say that unless reasons are given why it should not be done that are controlling, as they were before, I am inclined to think that war certainly should be declared against Turkey.

I hope the Senator will let the resolution go to the committee for its consideration.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is really making a demand upon the President either to ask Congress for a declaration of war against Bulgaria and Turkey or to state to the world that cause does not now exist for a declaration of war against Bulgaria and Turkey. It makes it necessary to make such a statement. The Senator from Pennsylvania can obtain the same information without involving the Chief Executive of this country in a declaration. The Committee on Foreign Relations will now adopt a resolution of the character the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes, requesting the information on behalf of the committee. If it satisfies the Senator from Pennsylvania, I know that there are Senators here who would be satisfied with the declaration of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

If the Senate is not then satisfied with the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations it will be ample time to introduce a resolution going over the head of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and compelling, as far as the Senate may compel—because the request is almost a demand—the communication of this information and a statement as to the attitude of the President in the matter.

I for one, as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, have never heard of this matter since it was first brought before the committee. At that time, by unanimous consent, the subject was dropped. Had the Senator from Connecticut or the Senator from Pennsylvania at any time recently suggested to the committee at any of its meetings that the information was desired from the President by the committee or any member of the committee, I, for one, would have supported that request. I am prepared to support it in committee now, but I can not see the necessity of involving the Chief Executive in a declaration of this kind at this time. I think it is totally improper.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I simply want to inquire of the Senator if he has noticed the exact language of the resolution that I offered as a substitute? It does not involve the President in any declaration of any character that he has not already publicly and freely made. Everybody knows that a state of war does exist between Turkey and Bulgaria and the United States. The only question is, Is it expedient to declare the existence of that state of war?

Senators are constantly using the expression that we declared war upon Germany at such and such a time, or that we should declare war upon Turkey and upon Bulgaria. We have never declared war on any of these countries. We have only declared that by their acts they have brought on a condition or state of war, which we thereby recognized.

The President has said that logically, when we declared the existence of a state of war with Austria, we should have declared that same state of war to exist with Turkey and Bulgaria, but that it was not expedient at that time to do so. This resolution only inquires whether it is expedient now to do so, or whether those reasons still exist.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the same condition would have existed just two days prior to our declaration that a state of war existed with Germany. We did not declare war on Germany. We declared that a state of war existed with the Imperial German Government. The same condition existed with relation to the German Government prior to our declaration that exists with reference to Bulgaria now; and yet I doubt if the Senator from Pennsylvania, a week or a month or a day prior to the declaration of the existence of war with the German Government, would have introduced a resolution of this character with regard to Germany. Why? Because it was too serious a matter. That is the reason why he would not have done it with regard to Germany—because it was a matter peculiarly within the executive functions of this Government until it was properly brought before the Congress of the United States.

The Senator from Pennsylvania has attempted to draw a distinction between a declaration of war and a declaration of a state of war. The distinction is clear to all of us, but it has not any effect whatever with regard to the propriety of his resolution—not the slightest—any more than it would have had with regard to the propriety of a resolution of the same character introduced with regard to the German Government before our declaration with regard to that Government. Consequently, his differentiation does not change the conditions at all.

The Senator's resolution does call for an expression on behalf of the Chief Executive of this country. That expression is equal to a declaration of war or a denial that war should be declared, whether you call it a declaration of war or a declaration of the existence of a state of war. Now, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if there might not be conditions submitted to him by the Chief Executive privately that would warrant him in believing that it was to the interest of this Government that nothing at all be said about this matter? The Senator from Pennsylvania realizes that it is impossible to discuss these matters in an official way without having some effect. He desires information, and yet he has not attempted to secure that information. He desires information as a Member of this body, and yet he is a member of a committee that has had this matter before it for months, and not in months has he sought, through that official channel, to obtain this information. He has not any doubt at all but that if he went to the President of the United States he would be satisfied with regard to this matter. He has not any doubt—at least, he has not expressed it—that if he should suggest this to the committee of which he is a member the committee would follow his suggestions and ask for the information from the President. He has not any doubt that that committee would receive just as much if not fuller information in regard to the subject upon which he desires information as this body would receive. If he is seeking information, why does he not seek it through the proper channels? If that information does not satisfy him, then he can proceed along the lines along which he is now proceeding. If he thinks that that information can not be imparted by that committee to this body, then he can say so in his report, and renew the offer of his resolution. But the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Connecticut have brought this matter suddenly before this body without the slightest intimation to the committee that has the matter in charge; and I say that had they brought it to the attention of the committee, the committee would have acted on their suggestions, and will now act on their suggestions.

The motion that will be made to refer to the committee the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania will have no more force and effect than to defeat the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania. It is certainly immaterial whether it be referred or not. If it be referred to the committee, then the matter will be in the same condition that it is now. That is, it will be before the committee. It is immaterial whether it is before the committee on the original resolution or on this resolution. Nevertheless, the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania should either be referred to that committee or should be defeated by this body; and I pledge the Senator from Pennsylvania now as a member of the committee—and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has already made his pledge—that I will cooperate with him to the fullest extent to obtain all information for him and for that committee, and for this body through that committee, that he can obtain or hope to obtain through his pending resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if I were upon a boat in a tortuous channel it would take a good deal to make me attempt to take things in my own hands and interfere with the pilot, the captain of the boat.

Something was said by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] about this being "the day of public diplomacy," and at the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] he said it was the day of "pitiless publicity."

Everybody has a great deal of sympathy with the idea of public diplomacy, but nobody has ever yet been foolish enough during war times to make public everything which had any bearing upon the carrying on of the war or the conclusion of the war itself.

Now, I do not know, frankly, any reason why this Government should not declare that a state of war exists between these United States and both Bulgaria and Turkey, but I do know that there may be very many reasons why they should not, and I do know that the very purposes which are in the minds of the Department of State might be defeated by making those reasons public.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3771.

REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3771) authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator yield to me to make an inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to lose the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is not going to lose the floor by yielding for an inquiry.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will not yield to me to get up the housing bill to-day if the debate lags and there is not anyone who wants to speak on the unfinished business?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator, if no one wishes to speak and the condition arises later, so that it will be necessary to lay aside the bill temporarily, that may be done; but I do not wish the Senator to be misinformed. I think all the time will be taken up by debate on the unfinished business.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask if the Senator will not move an adjournment and meet to-morrow at 11 o'clock, so that the housing bill may be disposed of. It is a measure of most urgent necessity.

Mr. OVERMAN. I appreciate that; but, as I stated yesterday, I promised the Senate, if they would give me unanimous consent, that I would continue the unfinished business before the Senate. The Senator knows the situation as well as I do. He has seen what has been accomplished by taking an adjournment yesterday afternoon, and the same thing might happen to-morrow.

Mr. SWANSON. It may be that we will hardly get a vote in the Senate except by unanimous consent or by mental and physical exhaustion, but I have been trying to reach a vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has done all he could. It is not the Senator's fault.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yielded to the Senator from Virginia. I have no right to control the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will not move an adjournment to-day until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, and then at 1 o'clock, if the housing bill is not disposed of, some agreement may be reached.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to any arrangement about an adjournment. That will come up later on. This is not the time to arrange an adjournment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire is a wise one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I address myself to the pending bill relating to the consolidation of the executive departments, assuming that that in a parliamentary way is before the Senate. Am I correct in the assumption that the bill providing for a consolidation of executive departments is now before the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. The so-called housing bill has at various intervals taken some of the time of the Senate, the former bill being laid aside for that purpose.

Mr. President, if the departments or bureaus or commissions which are sought to be consolidated, or whose functions are to be transferred, were written in the pending bill I could readily strain whatever belief I might have in favor of vesting the power in the Executive for that purpose. The bill, however, as written is one of a general, blanket authority. It is of such a universal character and carries such vast undeveloped powers, which ordinarily belong to Congress, as to arouse some question of the wisdom of the transfer of those powers to the Executive. Ordinarily the creation of a new department and the abolition of one already created is the exercise of a legislative authority. All of these departments have been created by acts of Congress; many bureaus, commissions, and boards have been created by various acts of Congress. It is now sought by one general delegation of that creative power to the Executive to vest in him the right to transfer the powers of these departments or to delegate the exercise of the functions of such departments from one to the other, or to combine many, or even all, in one.

It is true there is no specific power contained in the bill vesting in the President the power to create a new department or a new commission, but the transfer of the functions of a department, bureau, or commission in substance is a destruction of the department, bureau, or commission whose functions are so transferred. A great many bureaus have been destroyed by merely transferring the powers of those bureaus to others. It makes no difference whether the bureau continue or not, or whether the commission or board shall remain in existence, if all of its powers are transferred to some other board or commission or bureau, though the commission may continue to exist as a mere automaton, it has nothing to do; it has no governmental functions of any kind, because they are transferred to some other governmental agency. Thereby the former ceases to be of any practical value in the administration of public affairs. So, whatever may be the language of the bill, the necessary substance of it is to destroy the bureau whose function is taken away and vested in some other bureau or board.

In the rough there are nearly 200 bureaus, boards, commissions, and departments affected by the potential action of the Executive under the powers sought to be conferred by this bill. If the Congressional Directory alone should be taken as the guide, nearly 200 bureaus are found there that would be affected, and some of them would be entirely destroyed. The necessary effect of that, then, would be to give to the President the power to take from any one of these departments or bureaus its functions and destructively to transfer them to another one.

This is justified, or sought to be justified, by the necessities of the war, the conditions which prevail making it desirable. Mr. President, this is not the method of reforming existing conditions that is a practical one, as it seems to me. We are not now suffering from a lack of power in the Executive or in the departments, but from the lack of the proper exercise of executive powers that already exist. The President now has power to do many of these things that are not done and the power to do some of the specific things which are provided for in the bill. It is not a delegation of further power, Mr. President, to the Executive which is needed, but it is the choice of men for the execution of powers already vested.

In deciding whether such a blanket delegation of authority ought to be vested in the President, I first find myself inevitably driven to the examination of the exercise of powers already vested. They have, of course, been exercised by the choice of men for the execution of governmental powers. These men, when selected, very largely determine the effectiveness or the lack of effectiveness of the power or the law which they administer or put into execution.

What are some of these bureaus, boards, departments, and commissions that are affected? I have made, Mr. President, a rough draft of some of them that would be covered under the express terms of this bill. The national banks have been in existence since the Civil War; they have been built up upon the business of communities by administration, under the Comptroller of the Currency as a subordinate of the Secretary of the Treasury, until they are a well-defined and necessary instrument of our fiscal system and are closely interwoven with all the business of the country. Because of a waste of financial power and sometimes its abuse; sometimes, before legislation regulated them, because of a lack of organization of the reserves placed in the correspondent banks of all the national banks, as well as private and State banks, some question arose as to the regulation and disposition of the reserves of the various banks of the country. It was followed by a very long investigation. The Monetary Commission prepared a voluminous report, which recommended in substance a central reserve bank. That recommendation did not meet with much favor; it was not adopted by Congress following the report of the commission, and it found no favor in the financial legislation or the banking legislation when the Federal reserve bill was pending. The Federal reserve act, however, without going into an analysis of it, accomplished in substance all of the recommendations of the Aldrich commission by dividing the authority and scattering it over the United States nominally, but really keeping all of the authority in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury; in fact, the Federal reserve act is in itself an execution of and a tribute to the report of the Monetary Commission. That act only harvested the net results of that investigation; therefore, the national bank act, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Comptroller of the Currency, who has jurisdiction over them as a regulatory officer, are directly connected with each other.

The Rural Credits Board, designed to make easier the borrowing of money by farmers, is connected directly with the monetary and banking affairs of the country. At this session there has been passed a War Finance Corporation act that is also vitally connected with the finances of the country. It provides for an organization with a capital stock of a half billion dollars, to be advanced as credits or used for various purposes. Then, in addition to that, a very large potential credit can be created and extended to various business enterprises by the same organization. This has in turn a very powerful influence over all the public utilities of the country—gas, electric light, street railway, subways, elevated roads, all of the telephone systems of the country, such water systems as remain in private ownership, drainage districts, irrigation districts, and anything comprised in the general term "public utility."

It is provided that as their obligations fall due and their credits mature the War Finance Corporation may extend help under the conditions named in the bill, thus creating a sort of voluntary conservator of our financial resources in the Finance Corporation. It has recommending powers and powers either of approval or disapproval as to whether a public utility shall be allowed to issue securities. Generally their approval or the lack of it would very largely affect the ability of the concern to market its bonds. If the War Finance Corporation, or its committee from the Federal Reserve Board, which amounts to the same thing under the interlocking provisions of the two acts, withhold their approval, it would very materially affect the marketing of the bonds.

Here, therefore, are five organizations that are directly connected with each other; one, the oldest, the National Banking System; next, the Federal Reserve Board; the Rural Credits System; then the War-Finance Corporation; and last, all the public utilities of the country. All these powers, under the provisions of this bill, could be vested in a single authority; they might all be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Federal Reserve Board now has a very intimate connection with the Treasury Department, as have the national banks. If the Rural Credits System, with its possibilities for indefinite expansion, should be added to the same consolidation, it would make of itself, when connected with the public utilities of the country, the greatest single authority over financial business and credit that the country ever saw. I doubt whether any country in the world would have in a single department the vast powers that would be wielded by the Treasury Department if that should be the department chosen for the consolidation of those powers under the authority of this bill.

A part of the transportation system of the country, Mr. President, is the Panama Canal. That is now controlled by a separate commission. The Isthmian Canal Commission has since a very early time in the construction of the canal had full charge of its affairs. Still the Panama Canal is a part, and a vital part, of the transportation system of the country. A great deal of what has heretofore been transcontinental railway traffic will go through the Panama Canal, as a matter of course. Therefore it becomes intimately connected with our railway system. The railway system of the country already has been placed in the hands of the Director General of Railways—250,000 miles of railways, with all their capitalization and equipment. The enormous powers and the influence that go with such powers as those are now vested in the hands of a single person for war purposes, and are to continue in those hands for 21 months after the war has ended. One would ordinarily think that the Director General of Railways was possessed of sufficient power and responsibility now to make his a fairly busy man's occupation. However, this is only a part, for all of the functions of the Isthmian Canal Commission could under this bill be carried to the Director General of the Railways.

It is said that that would not be done. I do not know, nor does anybody else know, whether it would be done or not. It is enough to say that under the general blanket provisions of this bill it could be done. The Isthmian Canal Commission could then have their offices consolidated with, and their functions vested in, the Director General of Railways. That would be lawful under this bill, however unwise or however finally one great department might become overloaded.

With the affairs of the Panama Canal transferred to the Director General of Railways, the Director General of Railways would then control the land and water transportation systems of the country, because, since the creation of the Shipping Board, all of the inland water transportation, as well as the coastwise trade and the over-seas transportation, are in one head. Then, if the Isthmian Canal Commission should be transferred it would be just as logical, in the interest of consolidated authority, to transfer the functions of the Shipping Board and unite them, because they are all a part of the war program, and all of the inland transportation, both by land and water, reaching any of our port cities would be a part of the transportation of supplies from our markets to our armies across the sea.

I think, Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury, having control of the national banks, having a supervisory authority over the Federal Reserve Board and direct control by statute of the rural-credits system, having very large powers and responsibilities under the War Finance Corporation act, and having his hand thereby upon every public utility in the United States, to transfer to him, in addition to that, the power, as could be done under this bill by the President, to control all of the other methods of transportation, both on land and sea, constitutes that degree of danger that stamps this bill in its present blanket form as unwise, as a positive menace to the orderly administration of affairs, even in war times. No man is equal to the task. It is the history of departments that grasping for power is the rule. The opportunity is given for the President to concentrate in a single department of his choice every other one, and delegate it to various personal representatives independent of statutes. It governs by the will of one man, not by the settled rule of law. It drifts to the uncharted region where monarchs are sometimes found.

Here are some other very important functions: The industrial enterprises of the country—I presume a part of the credit of the United States, exercised through various contract bodies, all of them finally coming to the Secretary of the Treasury, some of them not having enough money to carry out contracts of the size they have taken from the Government—would be affected. Some of them necessarily would be in the same catalogue with public utilities. Therefore, if the industrial enterprises of the country are taken over by the Government, like shipyards, steel plants, iron-ore smelting enterprises, then packing houses, establishments manufacturing all of the articles that directly or indirectly are connected with war, including agricultural implements and all the vehicular implements required in war, would become a part necessarily of the industrial system and be justified in the transfer of the different functions to another head or to the same head. Investment companies, bond houses, become directly dependent upon the powers that are embodied in this bill. They can do no business unless the bond issues in which they deal have received the approval of the committee of the Federal Reserve Board, which in turn relates back to the head of the department, the Secretary of the Treasury. Therefore the industrials, the railways, the Isthmian Canal, the War Finance Corporation, the investment companies, the public-utilities company, the Rural Credits Board, the Federal Reserve Board, and the national banks, all of them could be—because they are connected with each other directly—transferred to the same authority. The functions could be transferred, and the men who execute the different administrative powers could be transferred with the functions. It would leave a vacancy; it would leave, maybe, the inert, lifeless shell of the commission remaining, but without power, without duties to perform, without appropriations, without any functions; and necessarily, remaining in that state of suspended animation, the bureau or department is destroyed. So the bill of itself transfers all of the powers, and it had as well contain positive power to destroy the bureau or the department itself.

The War Department and the Labor Department could be united for that matter under this bill. It is true that it would be an unreasonable sort of a union, but possibly not more unreasonable than some things that have already happened.

What is this to be done for? Under the name of efficiency! It will help in the preparation for the war! Why, the powers exist now. The junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], in about five minutes, from the plenitude of his experience in the executive departments, showed what a President can do—call together the members of the Cabinet, the heads of bureaus or boards or commissions, find what object is to be accomplished, show how their departments or bureaus are related to each other, and ask them to join in the execution of the common purpose to reach the goal. That is all that is needed; and out of the experience of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania, in a few well-chosen words here, he showed, in a most illuminating flash on the Senate, how it could be effectively done in the absence of legislation.

The main thing is to get the practical result, after all; not merely to legislate in an academic way. If the President would take the men he already has, call them into his presence, and tell them what he wishes accomplished he could do it all by a mere request to them to unite their efforts, if they are practical men.

I suspect, Mr. President, that is not the trouble. He has about him what by this time must have forced its way into his understanding, as it has into the understanding of many in the Senate Chamber—men to whom he has delegated power, whom he has appointed, some of them to high public place, whether wisely or unwisely we need not stop to inquire now, who are not performing effectively; but in the stress of war it would be extremely embarrassing to call on them to resign. To err is human, but the noblest human quality is to correct one's own errors, rather than charge them to Congress. For my part, I decline to become an agency to request the unwise appointees the President has made to resign. Let him exercise his undoubted executive authority, and ask them to resign.

The President has a good Scotch jaw on him that is inherited from some kindly ancestor. He has determination. He has understanding. Let him not pass up to Congress what he ought to do himself, and what he has undoubted power to do now. Under the guise of efficiency I think there are more crimes committed than any other masquerade I know of in this country.

At a meeting of a society of engineers held a few days ago there were present a number of engineers of all kinds connected with railways and industrial enterprises, those who meet all of the problems of engineering in this country. One of them, with a disposition to use a quill, evolved the following:

THE ENGINEER.

[Sung to the tune of "Son of a Gambolier" at a meeting of the Engineering Society of Buffalo.]

Who is the man designs our pumps with judgment, skill, and care?
Who is the man that builds 'em and who keeps them in repair?
Who has to shut them down because the valve seats disappear?
The bearing-wearing, gearing-tearing mechanical engineer.

Who buys his juice for half a cent and wants to charge a dime?
Who when we've signed the contract can't deliver half the time?
Who thinks a loss of 26 per cent is nothing queer?
The volt-inducing, load-reducing electrical engineer.

Who is it takes a transit out to find a sewer to tap?
Who then with care extreme locates the junction on the map?
Who is it goes to dig it up and finds it nowhere near?
The mud-bespattered, torn and tattered civil engineer.

Who thinks without his products we would all be in the lurch?
Who has a heathen idol which he designates Research?
Who tints the creeks, perfumes the air, and makes the landscapes drear?
The stink-evolving, grass-dissolving chemical engineer.

Who is the man who'll draw a plan for everything you desire
From a trans-Atlantic liner to a hairpin made of wire?
With "ifs" and "ands," "howe'ers" and "buts," who makes his meaning clear?
The work-disdaining, fee-retaining consulting engineer.

Who builds a road for 50 years that disappears in two;
Then changes his identity, so no one's left to sue?
Who covers all the traveled roads with filthy oily smear?
The bump-providing, rough-on-riding highway engineer.

Who takes the pleasure out of life and makes existence hell?
Who'll fire a real good looking one because she can not spell?
Who substitutes a dictaphone for coral-tinted ear?
The penny-chasing, dollar-wasting efficiency engineer.

That is where they come from most of the time nowadays. Under the guise of efficiency, this bill is sought to be put through the Senate in its present form. Here is the argument. It is all the argument that I have heard, when it is boiled down: My very capable colleague from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the chief representative of the President and his emergency Senator in stormy times, made a speech in the Senate April 6, 1918, published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 13, 1918, on page 5490, uses the following as an argument. This is apart from the efficiency idea:

Any man who now is against the war is against America—

From which no patriotic man would differ—

and any man who is against any measure that the President demands as necessary to win the war is against the President. * * * The country gave Wilson the power in the declaration of war and demands of Congress to throw off its bridle and bit.

Mr. President, I do not argue against the assertion that any person who is against the war is against America. That is self-evident. Whenever our country is in war the public enemy must be overcome. But immediately following and connected in the same sentence is the statement that—

Any man who is against any measure that the President demands as necessary to win the war is against the President.

Because I may differ from the Executive on the details of how he shall best execute a war power, it does not argue that I am against the President. I decline to surrender my thinking apparatus—inferior as it may be, it is the only one I have—into the keeping of any Executive or any other Senator. I differ from my friends. So does the Executive. Does that convert me into an enemy of my friends?

Does it necessarily follow that I am against the President because I may not agree with him on the details of legislation which the President has requested to conduct the war? He comes to Congress requiring legislation. He can not perform the duties imposed upon him by mere Executive orders. Does it follow, because I do not agree with him on the details of how the war shall be conducted, the extent and manner of exercising present power, or how a given matter of legislation shall be performed, that I have thereby arrayed myself against the President? I think not.

The best friend the President has in the world to-day is the one who will candidly tell him the truth. I heard the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], in his place some weeks ago, replying to a letter written by the Executive charging him with misrepresenting, to say the least of it, the condition of our military preparations, make a powerful and candid appeal, a most dignified and senatorial reply. He said, "I do not question the President's sincerity, but I do say that the President does not know the truth"; and that is so. He does not know what the truth is on many things connected with legislation he is asking. So it becomes here a question of candid, constructive criticism, in a refusal merely to pass such measures as he frames and sends to the Senate.

There is one matter here in regard to which the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has a great wealth of information and some very clear-cut and accurate ideas. He has referred to the possibility, especially in view of the act under which the President has taken over the railways, and the appointment of a Director General, of the rate-making power being likewise assumed as well. I am like other Senators who have commented on this question. If the President or Senators here who support this bill will write out the departments whose functions are to be affected, and name the bureaus that are to be abolished, or whose functions are to be transferred, any board or commission of any kind whose powers or functions are to be taken from one to the other, if they are no longer needed, I am willing in such cases to give Executive discretion to abolish them. Let it be done, if there is any reason why it should be done. When an object is to be attained with a clear understanding of the means by which it is to be accomplished, can be written in a bill, I will go to the extreme verge, so far as I have a voice here, to vest in the President adequate power of the most plenary character to carry out any consolidations and to make effective any of the departments or bureaus in their relation with each other and with the correlation and work that all of them are finally to perform as a war measure. When it comes, however, to vesting in the Director General of Railways or in the President of the United States the power, absolute in its character, to make rates, I might well hesitate.

Since 1887, now something over 30 years ago, the Interstate Commerce Commission has been in existence. It has built up, just like all other experiments of that character, its powers. It has handled the railway systems of the country. Whatever its shortcomings, whatever restrictions have been built up by it around the steam railways of the country—and it must be remembered that at times the commission has made orders that have been severely criticized by much of the general public—but if there are any restrictions under which the roads ought not to labor, the Interstate Commerce Commission, in following out the legislation of Congress, the original act and all amendatory acts, and the decisions of the Supreme Court, assuming that its members have a fair degree of human nature, pays some attention to the condition of the public mind on those questions. At least from all these sources the commission has built up a system of rate making. Precedents have been made, many cases have been heard, and the system itself is one under which the railroads have learned to operate. Why should that power be transferred to someone else? And yet in my opinion the power is in this bill, and it is one of the hidden powers in the blanket authority sought to be conferred, to vest in the President, and by him to be delegated to the Director General of Railways, absolute rate-making powers which they do not now have, either of them.

The act that validated and confirmed the taking over by the Government of the steam railways contains a section in reference to the rate-making power. That rate-making power, Mr. President, is subject in its final operation to approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I suspect that that power is irksome to the present Director General of Railways. There are several things that lead me to believe so. One is that the Director General refers now to "the railroad." He says there is but one railroad in the United States, and that is the railroad of which he is the Director General. The individuality of all the railroads has disappeared. It is now one railroad. Naturally, it would interfere with his rate-making power to have the Interstate Commerce Commission continue to discharge its present functions. Under this bill, if the functions could be transferred from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the President, who in turn could delegate them to the Director General, then there is one man who possesses plenary power without limitation upon 250,000 miles of railway. He could increase rates for shippers; he could add switching and spotting car charges at pleasure. There is no one to veto the exercise of that power.

The switching and spotting charges referred to have been condemned by the Interstate Commerce Commission when sought to be imposed upon the shipping public. These switching and spotting charges can not always be passed along to the consumer. Sometimes they can be. Sometimes they can be absorbed in the charge made for the goods to be delivered to the purchaser at destination. In quoting prices, the switching and spotting charge can be quoted as a part of the freight rate and absorbed in the general price of the merchandise laid down at the end of the trip. That can not always be done, however, especially where there is competition in the same line of merchandise at distant points, where a house or a plant along the Atlantic coast competes with one in the Mississippi Valley or vice versa. In those cases a freight charge is material, and a switching charge added to one and not to another shipper may spell either successful competition or a retirement from that market.

A shipper of considerable experience left with me the figures, based upon an investigation in former cases, of the amount of revenue that would be obtained by the exercise of this power. A transfer under the provisions of this bill of the rate-making power without revision by the Interstate Commerce Commission would carry with it the right to impose these charges. One hundred and seventy-six million dollars would be collected in switching charges and car-spotting charges alone on the shippers of the United States every 12 months.

It is easy to remove limitations in a law after it is once passed. There was no substantial opposition here when the bill authorizing the taking over of the railroads was on its final passage and the amendatory proceedings had prior to that time. The question was raised whether it would deprive the States of the power to tax the steam-railroad properties lying within their respective borders. It was said that in the absence of a prohibition it would not. To make assurance doubly sure, however, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] offered an amendment that preserved the right of the States to tax the railroad property within their limits—a very necessary right. The assessments are made by some State authority. They are made in such a way as to arrive substantially at a fair distribution of the values of a carrier, even where it is an interstate line. I know that in my own State some long trunk lines start out of Chicago. One, for instance, the Illinois Central, runs from Chicago to New Orleans, La. In assessing the property in the State of Illinois there must be considered, in the determination of its value as an entire property, the whole railway from Chicago to New Orleans.

The terminal facilities in Chicago on the lake front are greatly enhanced in value by the outlet at New Orleans. The property values must be distributed. While it is an interstate line, the properties lying within the borders of any given State are for local revenue purposes, to be assessed and taxes to be levied by the various State taxing authorities.

How easy it would be to remove them! How much does it amount to in a given year? One hundred and seventy-two million dollars, as I remember, was paid in 1917. One hundred and seventy-two million dollars a year can be taken from the different State taxing authorities and added to the railways' net income.

At this point Mr. SHERMAN yielded the floor for the day.

Tuesday, April 23, 1918.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, on yielding the floor yesterday I was referring to the State and local taxes now levied upon railways. It was in pursuance of the definite purpose to relieve by several indirect devices the roads of certain burdens they have borne under essential private control that this was undertaken by the Government management.

Such local taxes have at various times—say, for three years from 1915—been a considerable sum, beginning with 1915, $139,000,000; in 1916, $147,000,000; and in 1917, $172,000,000. There is an average increase, taking it for some years back, of at least sixteen and a half million dollars annually in the local taxes levied upon railroads.

In order not to cripple various local bodies—State, county, district, municipalities, and the like—the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] offered an amendment to the railroad act when it was pending preserving those local powers found in section 15. That, however, is very materially emasculated by a provision in the latter part of the section.

My attention was directed to this by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I had not observed it even in the passage of the bill. It is a most material provision, however. It says "that nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect the existing laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation or the local police powers of the several States, except wherein such laws, powers, or regulations may affect the transportation of troops, Government supplies, or the issue of stocks and bonds."

I can see that a liberal interpretation of this exception would practically nullify the preceding portion of section 15 relating to the local taxing powers of the States. All that it needs in order to fully accomplish this purpose is the passage of a bill of the character now pending, containing unlimited blanket powers conferring upon the Executive the right to unite the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission with that of the Treasury Department or the Director General of Railways. The revenue laws of the States taxing railway property could be set aside, as they increase the burdens now assumed by the Government and so affected the war.

As it is now, under existing law, the Interstate Commerce Commission possesses plenary power in rates not only for passengers and freight but in auxiliary matters, referred to yesterday as switching charges, charges for spotting cars, the various regulations referring to contracts between express companies, and the Pullman Co., it being the only one operating a line of sleeping cars in the United States, wherein these burdens heretofore resting upon railroad companies could be so materially lessened as to prevent a very favorable ledger balance if the bookkeeping is to be attended to in the annual report made of the management of roads under the unified control of the Director General.

I think this exception in section 15 was made with this in view. The whole purpose of the legislation, and, I think, a hidden purpose lurking in this pending bill, is to enable the Government control of railroads to be made as favorable as possible in the annual report, showing the earnings and the expenditures in as favorable a light as possible for the Government management. It is an unfair advantage, but will be used to show the blessings of Government operations of railways.

I am led further to conclude this by a controversy which occurred between the Fuel Administrator and the Treasury Department not long since. I believe the railways have been attempting to enter into a contract for the purchase during the summer and fall months of a very large quantity of coal. Some controversy has arisen on favored rates to be applied to the railroads. Out of that controversy between the Fuel Administrator and the Director General it appears there was a dispute between John Skelton Williams, representing the Director General of Railways, and Mr. Garfield, the Fuel Administrator. The substance of it is that the railroads under the direction of the Government are attempting to obtain preferential rates in the purchase of coal. That has in view the same purpose as the relief from the burden of local taxation for increasing revenue for switching and other charges and for a general revision of the sources of income of the steam railroads of the country. It is for the purpose of lessening the expenditures on fuel account the railroads are to be given a preferential rate over that of the private consumer. A very large item of railroad expenses will continue, under Government control as they have been in private control, to be for fuel, and the lower the railroads can purchase fuel the better the financial showing of the railroads when a report is made.

So this controversy is one that was illuminating on the purposes of this bill. It indicates that one of the purposes of this measure is to enable a consolidation of powers in the Director General of the Railways or in the Secretary of the Treasury—they are one and the same person—in order to obtain fictitious and unnatural advantages for the operation of the railways under Government control.

These matters are ones, it is true, that are only incidental to the main purposes of the bill, but nevertheless I think they ought to be kept in mind. The Secretary of the Treasury is Director General of the Railways, and he has a variety of more or less important other functions in the Nation's economy. When all these powers are consolidated or may be under the provisions of this bill in a single person he will present an officer having the greatest governmental power of any other man in the civilized world. Those different departments that I enumerated yesterday, all of them, will be brought within the scope of his authority. Potentially, whether it will be depends upon the discretion of the Executive, or rather, I fear, not upon his discretion alone but upon such advice as he may get from those to whom he has delegated power.

When I look at the provisions of the bill I find all of those delegated powers proposed in the bill are of general or blanket character. They are not specific. The amendment offered by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] seeks to be specific in those delegated powers. The principle of that amendment appeals to me. I am not in favor of changing the present authority of the Bureau of Mines and Mining. I think it ought to remain where it is—with the Secretary of the Interior. I do not believe it ought to be transferred to the Army and Navy through its heads. I believe it would create more confusion and interfere with the production of necessary fuel during the slack season in the summer and fall than would otherwise happen if it remained unchanged. But the general purposes of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia are sound as being specific in character and having known limitations on the power of consolidation.

Therefore when my eminent colleague [Mr. LEWIS] said that the country gave to the President the power in the declaration of war, and he demands of Congress to throw off its bit and bridle, it is only a standing invitation to the Senate to put neither hindrance nor restraint upon the President in the exercise of legislative power.

The same power that created these departments, these bureaus and commissions, ought to be the power that consolidates, amends, or destroys the several acts by which they were created. It is an express delegation of legislative power to the Executive. All these having been created by acts of Congress, they ought in effect to be abolished in the same way or modified or consolidated.

I can not agree with my distinguished colleague [Mr. LEWIS] in his contention that we are against the war because we do not join in the delegation of these vast, undefined powers to the President. On the contrary, I think the best way of conducting the war is scrupulously to examine these powers, many of which are sought to be delegated by the President through his advisors and not by the direct acts of the President, since he gets his information largely on these matters of detail from those about him. We can better serve the President in making a careful examination of these powers that are sought to be delegated in this way.

I think during the time of something over four years now that I have had the privilege of being a Member of this body I heard on yesterday the most timely and pertinent address on a vital subject that it has been my privilege to hear. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], on a communication in relation to the Mooney case in California, made it the text, and properly so, of an address upon the general subject of the elements that are agitating to set aside the ordinary administration of justice in that State.

It was not only timely but it was a forcible address, with a great grasp of the underlying principles of these dangerous elements in the country. The Senator has thereby rendered a great public service and blazed the way in a pioneer advance which others must follow. It was forcible, too, in the candor and courage it displayed in laying down the sound ground for meeting and criticizing such efforts and the elementary basis upon which civil society is founded.

Barring two or three minutes, I heard the entire address. I not only approve of it but I fail to find any reason that the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] could find in that address anywhere for saying that it was a criticism of the local courts of California. On the contrary, I understood it to be in commendation of those courts; that justice had been administered impartially under all the forms and guaranties of institutional liberty, with the rules of evidence, the trial by jury, the employment of able counsel, ample time to investigate, and the hearing of all the evidence, with all the safeguards that have been thrown around a defendant placed on trial on criminal charges known to the English-speaking race. That is the substance of his address as I heard it and as found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning. I think it constitutes itself one of the greatest commendations of the courts of the country I have heard.

There was great prejudice upon the one side against the courts. There was some prejudice, no doubt, against the murder in cold blood of 10 persons by the explosion of dynamite in the suit case in San Francisco, against whoever the guilty men might have been. But the court holding, as it ought, the scales impartially between the prosecution and the defense administered justice. The Supreme Court of California has passed upon it, and the Senator from Washington referred to that fact, and affirmed the sentence of the trial court. Mr. President, I do not know what more the Senator could have said to commend the courts of California than that they had been the instruments for the orderly administration of justice in accordance with the rules of jurisprudence evolved by our Anglo-Saxon civilization through many centuries.

This is preliminary, Mr. President, to saying that in asking by this bill to delegate these powers of a vast, undefined character to the President, I properly can consider how he would use them in view of how he has already used existing power and the character of the men by whom he has surrounded himself, to whom he has delegated that power granted him generously and without question by Congress in many acts of a vital character. So keeping this in mind it has seemed to me that it was proper to consider these questions at all times and places in interpreting what would probably be done under the bill by what has been previously done.

I hold in my hand a book published in 1918 entitled "Our Revolution," by Leon Trotzky. Many of these articles were published in various socialistic papers in the United States when Mr. Trotzky was residing in the city of New York. He found this country a temporary place of refuge. He abused its hospitality by planting revolution in Russia, and at the same time lending his activities to the propagation of the poison among the element in our country, to which the Senator from Washington referred yesterday.

Mr. Trotzky is a native, as I remember, of Russia, in and about Odessa, or the wheat country of Russia. He is well known as an agitator. He left that country for his personal health during the ascendency of the Kerensky régime. He was a radical, a disturber, an advocate of direct action, which means revolution and force there or elsewhere. He came to this country for personal safety and remained until a certain time as the régime which Mr. Kerensky represented was tottering to its fall. He then returned to Russia and began the course of activity which resulted in the revolution with which we are all familiar.

In this country there is a similar systematic crusade. The significance of what the Senator from Washington said yesterday was in the connection in a logical way of this crusade with the practical affairs of our Government. He collected all over the world the relations those bodies, and especially on the Northwest Pacific coast, occupied to some of the communications that appear in this Chamber. There is a language of these agitators, I think, which is not always understood. Mr. Trotzky speaks often of the proletariat. That is almost a term of jest in our country, or has been. The proletariat to which Mr. Trotzky refers is as definite, however, in this country and known as the proletariat in Russia.

I want to read from Mr. Trotzky's book what this means. I do this because I think the President is playing with fire. I think he is collecting around him men of the kind that will make trouble with this same element to which the Senator from Washington referred. He defines the proletariat on pages 120 and 121. He speaks of the principal merit of scientific socialism to have discovered a social power in the person of the proletariat. He says:

> Whom should we consider a proletarian? Is the half-paupered peasant a proletarian? Should we count with the proletariat those hosts of the city reserve who, on one hand, fall into the ranks of the parasitic proletariat of beggars and thieves, and, on the other hand, fill the streets in the capacity of peddlers—i. e., of parasites on the economic body as a whole? It is not easy to answer these questions.
> The importance of the proletariat is based not only on its numbers but primarily on its rôle in industry.

He continues, on pages 122–123:

> This puts the proletariat into a position to be able to stop the functioning of the national economic body, partially or wholly, through the medium of partial or general strikes.
> Hence it is evident that, the numerical strength of the proletariat being equal, its importance is proportional to the mass of the means of production it puts into motion; the proletarian of a big industrial concern represents—other conditions being equal—a greater social unit than an artisan's employee; a city workingman represents a greater unit than a proletarian of the village. In other words, the political rôle of the proletariat is greater in proportion as large industries predominate over small industries, industry predominates over agriculture, and the city over the village.

He then quotes figures, that in Germany there are twelve and one-half million proletariats; in Belgium, 1,800,000, or 60 per cent of the entire population, all the persons who make a living independently; in England, twelve and one-half million. He does not give the percentage in the United States, but in substance he defines further the proletariat as the body of skilled producers who must use as instrumentalities "the ranks of the parasitic proletariat of beggars and thieves" to accomplish their purposes. He continues, on page 121, this explanation by saying:

> This puts the proletariat into a position to be able to stop the functioning of the national economic body, partially or wholly, through the medium of partial or general strikes.

This is the doctrine of the I. W. W., that they can stop the functioning of the productive energies of the country. The proletariat as defined by Mr. Trotzky is the basis or constituency of the workingmen's assembly, which was a revolutionary body which overthrew the preceding régime in Russia. The preceding Government is the one to which this administration loaned about $100,000,000, of which, the last report I read, some $88,000,000 had been by credit processes transferred to Russia, indicating a net loss under the present conditions in Russia of the entire sum of money. The first thing the new Government promoted by Mr. Trotzky and his associates did was to repudiate all the governmental obligations of preceding Governments in Russia. That included the loan made by the United States to Russia.

I might remark parenthetically here that this is in keeping with the iconoclastic propensities of all this school when they are trusted with governmental power. It is of that species of iconoclasm that wipes out all preceding governments and all the obligations known to civilized government or to civil society.

Now, having accomplished that, they start in anew. Let me from the current news show what the result has been. The present Government of Russia—and future Governments, for that matter—finds itself absolutely without credit in the markets of the world. Not one of its bonds can be sold in any of the great investment centers of any continent in the world. No man, except as a speculation, would buy a Russian bond on the market to-day; nobody would buy a new issue of bonds by the present Government, the basis of which is repudiation of every solemn pledge made by it. More than 40,000,000,000 rubles is the annual expenditure of the present Government of Russia represented by Mr. Trotzky and his associates. The income of Russia, in round figures, is about 3,000,000,000 rubles, and 40,000,000,000 is the annual expenditure. They repudiate every obligation of every public concern; everything in the nature of a public utility in Russia had its entire pay roll destroyed. Hours were shortened, wages were increased; what they called "favorable working conditions" were introduced, with the consequence of every public concern and department of every kind having its expenditures so vastly increased, without a corresponding increase either in taxes or in visible revenues of the Government, as to spell bankruptcy for both public and private undertakings.

Mr. Trotzky and his associates go further. With him is Mr. Lenine, who is of the same kind, professing the same principles, and, so far as they have any belief, indulging in the same practices. Mr. Lenine has been constantly associated with Mr. Trotzky in governmental affairs since the revolutionary Government was instituted. Both of them constantly refer to what they call "the bourgeois," requiring translation to the ordinary voter in this country. The bourgeois in this country comprises the kind of citizens to which you and I belong, Mr. President. It is what is known as the great middle class of the population; the great body of the people who possess their individual traits, who follow lawful occupations, who keep their families together, who are neither millionaires nor paupers, who are neither tramps nor parasites, following some line of occupation in private life. So the bourgeois of the United States is the only foundation upon which this Republic can endure. The bourgeois is the object of Mr. Trotzky's contempt and is the victim of his murderous propensities when government is actually administered by his revolutionary agents.

The bourgeoise constitutes the whole of the bourgeois, as a class. Against them Mr. Trotzky and his government level relentless warfare. He says they are the agents of tyranny; that they must be destroyed. He thinks more of the government referred to by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] yesterday as "a hobo government," and properly so, with all due deference to the dignified and well-considered expressions we ought to use in the Senate. There is no other phase that will so soon reach the consciousness of the American citizen as to call it by its right name. It is the most expressive phrase that could be employed. Mr. Trotzky and his governmental agents would embrace as a long-lost brother every one connected with the hobo government in this country, but one connected with and founded on the self-supporting, God-fearing, industrial middle-class element of the country, who are neither millionaire nor pauper nor idler nor vagrant—for those he has nothing but words of condemnation. It is the middle class, the bourgeoisie, as he defines it, against whom he levels his fulminations and directs his destructive agencies.

The workingmen's convention that was assembled was known as the Soviet. That is the body now representing the revolutionary government of Russia. I am taking time, and apparently it has nothing to do with this bill, but I think, Mr. President, it is vitally connected with matters in this bill for the following reasons: I shall, particularly when I speak of the Soviet, say we have some vital connection with it ourselves, and especially in the interpretation of this bill.

On March 11, 1918, the President addressed a cablegram to the Congress of the Soviets. They were the deputies or delegates from the revolutionary class to which Mr. Trotzky and his associates appeal; they are the "Reds" of that country; they are the anarchists, the disturbers, and those who believe in confiscation and repudiation with practical murder. The following was the President's language.

May I not take advantage of the meeting of the Congress of the Soviets to express the sincere sympathy which the people of the United States feel for the Russian people at this moment, when the German power has been thrust in to interrupt and turn back the whole struggle for freedom and substitute the wishes of Germany for the purposes of the people of Russia?

Although the Government of the United States is unhappily not now in a position to render the direct and effective aid it would wish to render, I beg to assure the people of Russia through the Congress that it will avail itself of every opportunity to secure for Russia once more complete sovereignty and independence in her own affairs and full restoration to her great rôle in the life of Europe and the modern world.

The whole heart of the people of the United States is with the people of Russia in the attempt to free themselves forever from autocratic government and become the masters of their own life.

This is signed by the President and dated at Washington. I will read the response of the Soviet. It shows, under the head of my comments, what I call playing with fire, that the President has in his hand a blazing brand and does not seem to know it. It is this that makes it especially pertinent to keep in mind the powerful appeal made by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] yesterday. Here is the reply of the Soviet:

The all-Russian Congress of Soviets expresses its appreciation to the American people, and first of all the laboring people and exploited classes in the United States, for the message sent by President Wilson to the Congress of Soviets in this time when the Russian socialistic republic is living through most difficult times.

The Russian Republic uses the occasion of the message from President Wilson to express to all people who are dying and suffering from the horrors of this imperialistic war its warm sympathy and firm conviction that the happy time is near when the laboring masses in all bourgeois countries will throw off the capitalistic yoke and establish a Socialistic state of society, which is the only one capable of assuring a permanent and just peace as well as the culture and well-being of all who toil.

A Socialist of Mr. Trotzky's type is a Socialist of "direct action." The I. W. W.'s are practical Socialists in this country. They believe in "direct action," not in moral suasion, not in mere words, not in the ballot box, but in the "direct action" of sabotage, of the destruction of industrial plants, of resisting even to the extent of the taking of life all authorities who undertake by any means to restrain them in their violent purposes.

Because of this message and the response, I think the President has made an unwise use of the power vested in him, although it is an Executive act, it is true. It is an encouragement to and it is taken as an encouragement by the Socialistic government which is framed and administered in repudiation, in confiscation, and wholesale murder by Trotzky and his associates.

Now, I go further in reading from the proceedings the internal policy of Mr. Trotzky's government, which is that of confiscation:

The rich, who have given their wealth, think the masses will pull them through. Somehow we must uncover the hidden wealth. Otherwise the bolshevist government is bankrupt. The Republic needs 28,000,000,000 rubles annually. Its prospective income is only 8,000,000,000. The hidden wealth must be uncovered and placed at the disposal of the Government.

This is a most cheering prospect for any civilized government to contemplate; that we are encouraging and passively putting our arms about a Government that proposes, not by voluntary loans or by the lawful processes of taxation to obtain a revenue, but to obtain it by seizing and confiscating property wherever it is found. How much better is that than the Kaiser? None. That is the freebooting method of the Kaiser and his military officers when looting of conquered cities.

On the 22d day of February, at a loyalty meeting held in New York, Mr. Gompers delivered an address. He talked to some purpose, as I think. It is in refreshing contrast to the President's recognition, although Mr. Gomper's signed a telegram himself addressing his congratulations to the Soviet in Russia. Still no action was taken on that; they simply read it, applauded, and made no reply. Nevertheless, on the date to which I have referred Mr. Gompers made this speech. He made it, referring to the refusal of himself and his associates representing the American Federation of Labor to join with the meeting of so-called workers, delegates at the Labor Peace Conference held in London. Mr. Arthur Henderson is one of the pacifist Englishmen who are quite prominent in this peace move.

The radicals of the Bolsheviki—have not given the people land nor bread nor peace; but, instead of finding the great people of Russia standing erect and fighting for their homes and for their lives, we find them licking the boots of the Kaiser and praying for mercy.

Says Mr. Gompers—

Yes; this radical gang has done that, and to it must be laid the charge of the undoing of Russia.

These are the identical men, Mr. President, to whom the President addressed his cablegram of congratulation.

They are showing their heads here—

Referring to our country—

If the so-called radicals of America could have their way, you would find the people of the United States in the same position as the people of Russia are now.

And then they invite us to peace conferences with representatives of the workers of enemy countries. Why, men and women, the Kaiser would not give a passport to German delegates who would not be bound to do his bidding. He would let no one go to those conferences who was not his minion.

I say to the Kaiser, I say to the Germans, in the name of the American labor movement, "You can not talk peace with American workers; you can not talk peace with us; you can not talk to us at all now. We are fighting now. Either you smash your Kaiser autocracy or we will smash it for you.

Yes, we say to the Germans, "Get out of France, out of Serbia, out of Belgium, and back into Germany, and then perhaps we will talk peace terms with you; but we will not talk peace with you before that is done."

Mr. Gompers and I, as I have said heretofore, have had our differences locally in the middle western section of the country, but on this manly platform which he proclaimed on Washington's Birthday I will join with Mr. Gompers and go to the limit of governmental or military force with him. He is right, he is everlastingly right, in refusing to join with the delegates of our enemy countries, whose sole purpose is to invent a peace without victory in order to weaken the military and naval forces of this country in the successful waging of the war.

In Cleveland, Ohio, on April 20, Mr. Gompers paid his respects to the Socialist Party in a way that I can most sincerely commend. He said: "There is no such thing as an American Socialist Party." Mr. Gompers told an audience of 1,500 at the club there that, "The American Socialist organization is merely a branch of the one in Germany—it is a part of German propaganda."

In Chicago last fall, at a meeting to advance the cause of preparedness, Clarence S. Darrow made an address. Mr. Darrow before the declaration of war was the leading member in the western part of the country of the Socialist Party. He summed it up, taking the American view strongly in favor of war, by saying, "Every peace movement in the country talks with a German accent." That is the entire story; it is true; and it is what Mr. Gompers referred to in his speech at Cleveland, Ohio, on the 20th of April.

Mr. President, there is some company which unfortunately I find the President has associated with himself; and I shall assume the disagreeable task of describing it. I had just as well mention names. I could generalize, but that does little good. I have already mentioned Mr. Lenine and Mr. Trotzky, and the cablegram of congratulations which, unfortunately, the President saw fit to send.

The Secretary of War is a half Socialist. He is a municipal Socialist, a brand of Socialism with which I might not find any criticism of itself, for many have a measure of that in them; we, perhaps, are in favor of water companies being run by the municipalities where we live. I know I am. Some of us favor the municipal ownership of street car companies. I do not find fault with my friends who hold that view. Some want gas and electric light plants administered by the municipality. So there is in many things a decided measure of Socialism. The public school is Socialistic; the Army and Navy are Socalistic; and so on; they are all joint governmental undertakings. But there is a well-defined limit, a line of demarcation between undertakings of a private character essentially carried on by private enterprise and those of a public character. Each generation will work out its own measure of what Government can do without breaking down. The support of the Socialism that demands that Government seize and operate all the instruments of production and distribution is the course on which Mr. Baker is embarked. It is a dangerous goal.

Secretary Baker is half pacifist and the other half Socialist. When before the Committee on Military Affairs, according to the published hearings, on being reminded of the delays in aeroplane construction, in the preparation of our military forces, in guns, heavy ordnance, machine guns, and the controversy between the adherents of the Lewis gun and the Browning gun, he dismissed the matter with an airy wave of his hand, saying: "There are 3,000 miles between us and the war." Now, after he has come back from his trip, I repeat the hope which I have already expressed that he will have learned what he could have learned without going to Europe if he had only listened to the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who had been talking preparation for years. The stalwart undertaking of the Military Affairs Committee, to which the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has frequently added his strengthening purpose, was that we should speed up and we should prepare to defend ourselves even before we declared war.

The trouble is the Secretary of War was a pacifist when he became Secretary of War; he was opposed to war; he proposed to end wars by moral suasion, by peace meetings, by arguments addressed to the justice of men. I hope that such measures will be efficacious at some time, but they are not now. I would rather settle in that way any quarrel with which we have anything to do, for I am not a fighter; but after looking on the face of Sir Douglas Haig, published in the Sunday papers, and the face of Hindenburg, I have made up my mind that there is only one argument appreciated by a man with a face like Hindenburg's—it is the heaviest ordnance we can make and can fire. It takes a gunshot between the eyes to argue with men with faces of that type. It is the only way civilized society can protect itself and that government of the people can endure.

I have no doubt that Mr. Baker has come back with much information, and I hope with a change of heart. I object, however, to educating the men the Government assembles about the Executive after such a long lapse of precious time and at such an infinite cost to the country. The educational processes ought to have been begun or, better yet, completed before such men assumed the robes of office.

Then there is Secretary of Labor W. B. Wilson, another authority and another member of the Cabinet. He made his debut to public notice by being in jail in Cumberland, Md., for violating the laws of the country. He is to be the gentleman in charge of the expenditure of $60,000,000 for housing and humanitarian purposes, with power to condemn even private residences and turn any member of the Senate out of his home by merely applying to a district judge of the United States court and obtaining the approval of the judge before filing the petition for condemnation or issuing an order by which the property is to be taken and you and your family put upon the curbstone.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FALL. My understanding of the provision now alluded to by the Senator is not that it is intended in any manner whatsoever to correspond to a condemnation proceeding. It simply provides that the occupied dwelling of a Senator or of a farmer shall not be taken by the Secretary by force of arms, as it were, upon 10 days' notice to vacate, but that the Secretary must go to a district or circuit judge, and file a petition stating that it is necessary for him to take that house. Then it does not provide that there shall be any answer allowed and that the case shall be heard upon petition and answer, or that the judge shall fix the compensation, or that a jury shall try the question of necessity but simply that in a summary proceeding, passing upon the petition itself, the judge shall say whether it is necessary. It simply substitutes the word or the action of one judge for the action of one, W. B. Wilson in every case.

Mr. SHERMAN. It requires none of the ordinary safeguards which are thrown around condemnation proceedings.

Mr. FALL. Not at all; it is not a judicial proceeding at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Merely on petition to a court and the order of the court your private property is under the authority of the Government.

Mr. FALL. In the case of a private occupied dwelling house, it merely substitutes the judge for the Secretary of Labor, with the same powers exactly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; one holds his property subject not to the ordinary process of law, but subject to the appeal of a military officer to any judge in the district to whom he shall see fit to apply. For instance, in Chicago, where we have a number of judges—and the bill does not say particularly what judge shall conduct the hearings——

Mr. FALL. Any district judge or circuit judge.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes. The application might be made to any one of the district or circuit judges of the United States resident in Chicago or any of the judges who come down from Milwaukee, Wis., or other points, to hold court. Mr. W. B. Wilson himself is a state Socialist as disclosed in many addresses and in many public utterances he has made in the years past; he is as unadulterated a Socialist in all of our domestic affairs as can be found in the purely Socialist camp of any of the organizations in the United States. His arbitrary will is a slight protection for American citizens.

Mr. Burleson, the Postmaster General, is a state Socialist——

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. FALL. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but the Senator has said that Mr. Wilson is a state Socialist. I can agree with the Senator; but I think that I might go a little further. Mr. Wilson has advanced a theory of state Socialism never before advanced by Marx or by any other state Socialist, namely, that property shall not only be confiscated for the welfare of the Nation or of the community or of the public but that the measure of the right to confiscate such property shall be its profit-bearing character; in other words, that the amount of profits derived by individuals from the management of their private property shall be the measure of the right of the state to take private property away from the individual.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; that is correct. When I speak of state Socialism I do not mean State in the narrow sense of our 48 States; I mean that the authority to take over an enterprise, whatever it may be, is technically in the state.

Mr. FALL. I understood the Senator; but I was making this distinction, that no other Socialist of whom I have ever read or heard has advanced the theory that the mere question of the amount of profits derived from the conduct of private property should be the measure of the right to subject that property to seizure by the state.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator is correct in that. In other cases, where the United States Government is possessed of the power to take over enterprises, the Secretary of Labor would be very well satisfied to have the power exercised by the Government on the basis of profits.

Mr. Burleson himself, in the same sense, is a state Socialist. Mr. Burleson has constantly, by message, report, public address, and otherwise, wherever he has had occasion to express himself, favored the taking of telegraphs and telephones and adding them to the Post Office Department. His favorite obsession is that mentioned by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. It singles out the successful. All who by ability and industry succeed would have the proceeds of their toil seized by the Government. Such a plan spells the end of progress and enterprise. It is the paralysis of individual effort and the threshold of Trotzky's government.

He in substance says that it is an anomaly for the communication of intelligence by wire, by telephone or by telegraph, to be in private hands. He wants it added to the Postal Service of the country and under his administration.

There is one almost laughable statement contained in his report of 1917, in view of all that preceded it about Government ownership of telegraphs and telephones. Mr. Burleson exhibits a strange lapse of memory or of understanding. In that report he recommends that all of the rural free delivery of the United States be taken out of the Government's hands and farmed out to private contractors under star routes; and he sustains it by the argument that the contractors can do the work cheaper and better than the rural cariers are now doing it for the Government. I agree with him on that as far as the efficiency of the private contractor goes; but it is contradictory to all of his arguments, the reports he has made, and to every utterance on the question he has made since I have known him to be in public office.

I do not think he is a fit person to decide it. He is carrying about to-day, in his private fortune, the proceeds of the labor of Texas convicts in connection with cotton farming on his land in Texas. I know that he will be ill-humored if I refer to that; but, nevertheless, I am prone to do it, because an investigation by the Legislature of the State of Texas showed that his farm was let out, run by convict labor, and that he received a share of the proceeds of the farm. He is the last person in the world to be talking about Government ownership and issuing orders and edicts from his department to the postal employees of this country denying them, in substance, the right to organize themselves to respectfully present their claims to Congress or to the department. Mr. Burleson represents, in a concrete form, labor that has no right to speak. This is another one of the President's advisors with whom he will consult on this bill after the power is delegated to him to consolidate the departments, to transfer the functions of one to the other, and the like.

I spoke the other day of Louis F. Post, who is the Assistant Secretary of Labor. Mr. Post is a single-taxer of long standing. For many years he has preached the beauties of the single tax. He once was in Chicago a great deal, and in the western country. He, in company with various gentlemen of that kind, has been on the lecture platform, and has written many beautiful essays on what the singe tax would do to turn this country into an economic paradise. I have seen more prismatic landscapes of an industrial heaven on earth drawn by Mr. Post and his associates than I ever saw in the wildest vision in my sleeping hours. I might add to that by saying that he is a Socialist. He boasts of it in private conversation, and even in public address. He is a Socialist, a state Socialist, and believes in the assumption by the Government or the State of all the essentially private enterprises of the country. He founded a newspaper known as The Public, and I quote from one of its issues this statement:

Founded, 1898, by Louis F. Post and Alice Thacher Post. The Public: A Journal of Democracy.

Mr. Post thinks just as Mr. Trotzsky thinks about the bourgeoise of this country. He wishes the middle class exterminated. It would serve his purpose if all the millionaires are destroyed, and nothing but the vagrants and the proletariat remained—no middle class out of which you can build a self-respecting republic, out of which institutional liberty can be drawn and maintained by ordinary governmental processes.

It is now said that he has no connection with this paper; and an issue of the paper not many weeks ago, following some comment that I made on that, denied that Mr. Post had anything to do with it. Well, that is entirely to Mr. Post's credit, because the paper under its present management, if it is possible for such a thing to be, is even worse than it was when Mr. Post edited it and owned it. Its editors are headed by Mrs. Joseph Fels, whose husband was known to fame through Fels-Naphtha soap. He died and left a goodly fund for the propagation and explanation of the beauties of the single tax all over this country. After a person gets right well bitten with that obsession, I give up hope. There is no cure for it this side of the grave. It is a pleasing theory; it sounds well; and the greater Socialist a person is the more it appeals to him, because, when it is analyzed, taking away the unearned increment by taxation means taking property from somebody else without paying for it. It is the great economic hobby of these gentlemen, after all, when you boil it down.

So much, now, for Mr. Post. I can not spend more time on him; but The Public, this paper, bearing on its caption the fact that it was founded by him, has an open apology and defense of the Industrial Workers of the World. It says:

The I. W. W. is to have its day in court, not alone in the Federal and State tribunals, where some of its members are called upon to answer to the charge of certain alleged crimes or misdemeanors, but in that larger court of public opinion, where the oppressed calls upon the oppressor to justify his acts.

Later on I will insert this in the RECORD. I do not want to take time to read it. This is explanatory of what I wish to say on it. It says, in substance, that the I. W. W. are guilty of nothing; they are the mere audible expression of protest against conditions. They can not help themselves. They are guilty of no crime, because there is an internal force that propels them to do what they do. They are catapulted into the arena of active life, as we usually see them performing, by economic conditions over which they have no control, and of which they are the sole incarnated protest on earth.

This article goes further. It says:

That riots are not primarily due to leaders, but to conditions, and that violence occurs only when the victims have come to feel there is no other way out.

I have associated for part of my life with what are known as alienists almost every day for some years. They are men who study the mind, who know that a man is insane before he knows it himself. Some of them have a tendency to become impractical on worldly affairs. I took up a lecture that one once delivered. He said, "There is no such thing as crime. Crime is only instability of the nervous system, induced by abnormal cerebral conditions, resulting in violent physical manifestations." [Laughter.] This is his definition of crime. That is the definition of this article to which I refer of the I. W. W.'s activities. It is instability of the nervous system. It is not economic vagaries, it is not any desire to commit crime, but it is simply a violent protest against conditions, inducing in them abnormal cerebral activities, resulting in such physical manifestations as burning property and murdering people, as they did in Utah and in California.

They are to be excused, not punished. They ought to be liberated, because they are simply protesting from their inner consciousness against conditions. The same thing destroys all moral responsibility. This is why I believe in Billy Sunday. If there is anything needed in this country now it is a return in the pulpit to preaching to the people the consequences that attend misbehavior in this world and 100 per cent sulphuric hell fire. We must expect to reap what we sow. Sunday is the greatest ally of good government in the United States. We have raveled out moral responsibility in this country. Nobody is responsible for anything; the belief is like this article in The Public. Everybody has an excuse. There is no such thing as responsibility for the I. W. W. or for anybody else. We are all Trotzkys, according to that article. What we do is based on ungovernable, for which we must be excused.

Let me get some of these I. W. W. documents, Mr. President. They are a beautiful collection. They come from all parts of the country; but I shall content myself with referring to those published in Chicago.

The I. W. W. publishing bureau is at 1001 West Madison Street, Chicago, Ill., and some of them are published at other points, I think on North Halstead Street. They say:

To-day the greatest drama in the history of labor is being staged in this country. It's the right to organize and strike versus the right to slave. Organized capital has succeeded in having indicted 166 members and sympathizers of the Industrial Workers of the World because of their activities in organizing the workers and demanding decent living conditions. They are awaiting trial, and funds are needed for defense. Which side are you on?

Contributors will receive receipt for each remittance and at close of trials an itemized accounting of all funds. Make all money orders and checks payable to the undersigned. Act now!

GENERAL DEFENSE COMMITTEE,
WILLIAM D. HAYWOOD, Treasurer,
1001 West Madison Street, Chicago, Ill.

Here is a chance for some philanthropically inclined person to help out the needy and the oppressed.

Sent out with their campaign material in this propaganda of violence is an article from The Public of date November 16, 1917, which follows the same general line of argument as the article to which I referred, that they are merely more or less vociferous and physical agents protesting against existing conditions. There never was a greater falsehood than that contained in the handbill to which I have referred. They are not representing the cause of labor. Mr. Gompers and every one authorized to speak for the American Federation of Labor says that they have no connection with that organization. He not only repudiates them but he criticizes them and their methods. They do not represent any protest connected with the labor cause in Chicago or elsewhere. The 166 men who are on trial in Chicago are charged with what the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] alluded to yesterday. They are specifically on trial for interfering with the draft, for interfering with the sale of Government bonds, for interfering with the progress of the war under the espionage act.

Here is another pamphlet, with an I. W. W. looking out from behind bars in a cell; and it says on the front page, where this picture appears, "We are in here for you. You are out there for us." It appeals, of course, for money to defend them, that they may be out again, interfering by their activities with the progress of the war. That is what they are in jail for.

Coming in the same mail, both from Chicago and from New York, is an appeal from the single taxers likewise for contributions to spread the glad tidings abroad. These single taxers use almost the identical argument made by the I. W. W.'s. They incite hatred of the laws and institutions now existing. They are another cult that need looking after occasionally.

Here is yet another of the trusted friends and advisors of the administration, Frederick Howe, of New York, commissioner of immigration, at $8,000 a year, at Ellis Island. I do not know whether any Members of the Senate have read Mr. Howe's book on "Socialized Germany" or not. If you are interested in that subject, it is a prolific matter, furnishing original information about Mr. Howe. Several years ago I went around on Thursday nights to a place where the Socialists have a hall, back in my country. They have a meeting there every Thursday night. The first time my attention was called to Mr. Howe's book was when I listened to a speech by a long-haired, somewhat ill-clad, oppressed victim of society. I would reckon by ordinary computation that he had had but one bath in his life, and that was the day he was born. Before he got through he was quoting liberally from Mr. Howe's book on "Socialized Germany" as the greatest book ever written since the days of Karl Marx, and he said that even August Bebel used it. Mr. Bebel died a few years ago. He was the living, incarnated voice of socialism in Germany, following out in practice Mr. Marx's theories. I presume that Mr. Howe, who has charge of immigration, would never find anything the matter on the educational test with anybody that understood the principles of his book. That would be a never-failing test. A man would possess great literary ability if he could read and expound it; and he could do more than any sane American citizen of the United States can, because nobody that has any practical sense could tell what it meant. I can see how it appeals to the average German metaphysician, because when they get through expounding something nobody can ever understand it; the problems they undertake to elucidate are not half so intricate as the explanations they give of the enigma to be solved.

Here is another. I do this with some reluctance. I refer to John H. Walker. Mr. Walker is the president of the State Federation of Labor of Illinois. Mr. Walker comes down to Washington and elsewhere. He takes occasion to go upon the platform and make patriotic speeches. I can join with Mr. Walker in doing that. There is no question between us there. If Mr. Walker would only be consistent, so that I could understand in what direction he was traveling, I would have no objections to him. The trouble is Mr. Walker talks at one time for the country and at another time against part of it. I find by referring to the report he made that he is a member of the President's mediation commission. This is a lawful body, and they have on several occasions reported to the President on a great variety of subjects. This report of January 9, 1918, contains in it the same apologies for the Industrial Workers of the World that the article from The Public contains—that the Industrial Workers of the World are only in a practical way making audible their protests against existing conditions. I refer to those matters and will at the conclusion of my remarks ask that they be incorporated in the RECORD without reading. Mr. Walker is a member of the committee on labor of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense. I find his name in the membership list published by the Government Printing Office in 1917 as "John H. Walker, president Illinois State Federation of Labor."

Who is Mr. Walker? Mr. Walker at home is a Socialist of the most radical type, a member, a leader of the Socialist Party. He has done more to spread socialism in the Mine Workers' Union of 100,000 members in Illinois than any other one man in that country. He is a Socialist, in my opinion—I state this only as my opinion—who is in favor of direct action. I base that inference on his conduct. He does not preach that in Washington, but he practices it at home.

I now read from an article signed by Mr. Walker, of January 6, 1918, and published in the Springfield News-Record, of Springfield, Ill. There has been a strike for over a year in that country, involving by sympathetic action all the allied branches of industry, and some of it going far beyond the limits of central Illinois. It began in a street railway strike, and the sympathetic action of various unions called out coal miners, grocery clerks, gas and electric light workers, everybody in all of the factories of that country, and for some days last summer and fall industry was entirely tied up. During that difficulty two cars were dynamited. Six persons were injured, and it was only good fortune that they were not blown into atoms. If the dynamite had been on the side of the car where the people were sitting, it undoubtedly would have killed them, because all of that side of the car was torn out. The companies concerned have repeatedly offered to arbitrate the question of whether there should be recognition of the union, hours, rate of wages, and terms of service. That has been repudiated by Mr. Walker, acting as the advisor of the local unions, with his associates. He asserts falsely in this article that the men are fighting for the right to organize a union. Nobody ever denies that in that country. That is conceded. What they do not concede is that a man must join a union to earn a living in this world. That is the bone of contention.

While the strike was on an order was obtained from the circuit court for that district restraining anyone from interfering with the property of the company. Some people violated that order; whether under Mr. Walker's associates' advice or not is not recorded now. They violated the injunction. They were sent to jail, and various penalties were inflicted on them then and afterwards, because of the contempt proceedings. They were tried by jury. Here is what Mr. Walker says in respect to the courts of our country. The judge who presided at these trials I have known for 30 years. He is as upright and humane a judge as ever administered a system of jurisprudence in an English-speaking country. Mr. Walker says, referring to the companies, that they have—domineered and tyrannized over them—

The employees—

worse than any Simon Legree ever did over his slaves; their action has degraded and prostituted our courts, made judicial harlots out of our judges, and resulted in those courts and judges and county officers—

Referring to the sheriff who prohibited riotous assemblies in the area concerned in his jurisdiction—denying the workers their rights under the law—courts and county officers that swore to uphold them.

He said, further:

It took the mine workers of Illinois nine months in 1897 to force the coal operators to do the right thing. It took them 10 years to put Sam T. Brush out of business. * * * By pursuing the same methods we can do the same thing.

At this time I wish to speak of the Brush affair briefly. In the strikes resulting from that trouble, 40 persons were killed in cold blood. A large part of the country was under martial law for weeks. Mining property was blown up; tipples were burned; men to-day in Illinois are carrying wounds upon their persons, and will take them to their graves, who were assaulted and beaten while peacefully pursuing their lawful occupations. These are the methods that John H. Walker commends, and advises his strikers to resume in Illinois, where 100,000 men are engaged in mining coal in their normal activity, and where hundreds of thousands more are engaged in making war materials. He advises them to renew the strike, and I have a report from persons making an investigation, to which I shall briefly allude, but take no time more than to say the report made by a patient investigation shows that they are preparing a strike now; that Mr. Walker is active in instigating this strike and preparing for the resumption of the violence and destruction by dynamite of property, the murder of peaceable men in Illinois in his jurisdiction, as the president of the Illinois State Federation of Labor. He, the adviser of the President on the mediation commission and a member of the labor committee of the National Council of Defense, goes upon the platform and makes patriotic speeches.

Patriotic is as patriotic does; and I ask Mr. Walker next Sunday, when he takes me to task for what I have said, in a date that he has, to answer these charges. I ask him to say whether he will pursue the course of a peaceable citizen and by his activity undertake to reduce lawlessness to a minimum and prevent those who listen to him from dynamite and violence and murder. If he can not do that then he is not fit to be an advisor of the President. I am trying to protect the President from the men who have thrust themselves about him and who I think are responsible for many of what seem to be official vagaries of his.

I do not care to say very much of Frank P. Walsh, of the industrial commission. He has said enough. It would be time wasted and love's labor lost. The chairman of the industrial commission appeared before the resolutions committee of the Democratic National Convention at St. Louis in 1916 with a socialitic platform of his own. He sought to force it upon the Democratic Party. It is to their enternal credit that they refused it. I do not know what the future issues may be, but I know there are such elements in the Democratic Party that in the years to come, if some of my associates and myself are spared, we may be found touching elbows in the same common cause. It is against the firebrands of disorder, those who seek to destroy the restraints of civil society, and, as the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] said yesterday, to put the bolsheviki, of which there is an element of uncertain numbers in our country here, in control of the Government.

Here is another and a very distinguished citizen of my country—a neighbor of mine. I speak of him in no uncomplimentary way, the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Vrooman. Mr. Vrooman is mildly Socialistic. He does not believe in direct action. Far from him, he would never hurt anybody. He is in the same frame of mind that the woman was when an inconsiderate friend committed suicide in her parlor. The coroner in holding the inquest lifted up the body and the woman said, "Well, well, the thoughtless creature has ruined my fine Persian rug. Why could he not have bled somewhere else?" Mr. Vrooman would not hurt anybody. It would spoil the dilletante sentiment that he has. He wishes to argue the thing out. He is pacific in his nature. A kindly gentleman. An estimable man. He never wishes to hurt anybody. He is a parlor Socialist, but is the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture; he is giving advice to the President, and he can add his mite to the general verdict of this group that surrounds our President.

Here is another of whom, no doubt, many of us have read who has been recently added to this coterie of economic advisers—Roger W. Babson, of Massachusetts. Mr. Babson is like a good many who deal with statistics a long time; they become temporarily bewildered when they must do things. Mr. Babson has lost his rudder in the deep sea of statistics and he has not got his soundings yet. On practical matters I can not but think of him as unsafe an adviser as there is in the world. If you give him a row of figures with some statistical observation of what he calls sociology and tell him to work on it, he can produce beautiful results on paper; but I would rather take an old granger or a man running a poultry yard for practical purposes, or a cowboy in the Southwest, to get good government out of a given number of people than all the Babsons you can collect from now till the end of time.

Here is another. Here is Mr. Townley. Mr. Townley came here not long ago and talked with the President. Mr. Townley was a much maligned individual. Mr. Townley had been aspersed. Mr. Townley had been indicted. He had been falsely charged with being an enemy of the Government. He informed the authorities here, so I learned, that he was strictly loyal. What he was doing was trying to rescue his constituents from the monopolies of the Northwest, among whom were not only mills and millers but the great mercantile enterprise, the carriers systems, and especially the great iron and steel industries of the northern peninsula reaching over into Minnesota.

I can begin to get a little light on Mr. Townley, and I think the rest of us can if we just keep in mind and watch his maneuvers. Michigan and Minnesota are the great sources of iron-ore supply in this country. He is trying to establish himself in that immediate neighborhood. That is where he can marshal his forces and start trouble in the iron-ore country, interfere with the barge service, tying it up in a strike at this great source of supply. One of the things that Mr. Townley is concealing is the claim that he is representing the farmers of the country—the oppressed farmer. As a matter of fact, I charge here on my own responsibility that Mr. Townley represents pro-German influence in this country, and he has German money in some place that inspires his activity, and at the right time there will be a strike in the northern peninsula, from which we draw our supplies of iron, when it will cripple us most.

Mr. Townley in bankruptcy proceedings is an eminently successful man. He accumulated $80,000 worth of debts with $500 worth of assets. Anybody who can do that is something of a genius, I admit; but his creditors thought that it was unkind of him not to think of their interests more. On the hearing he disclosed no visible assets. That is a chronic condition with most of these reformers. There is none of them who has any asset but language. They pay a debt by the statute of limitations or by bankruptcy. I never knew one of them who could do otherwise who makes such claims as Townley.

Here is another Mr. D. C. Coates. Mr. Coates was lieutenant governor of the State of Colorado during the exciting administration of "Bloody Bridles" Waite. We all remember "Bloody Bridles," a unique figure among the coterie of governors in the various States of the Union elected that year, and all of them had their fads, among others Mr. Coates.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is mistaken as to the time when Mr. Coates was the lieutenant governor. It was not during the administration of Waite but of Gov. Orman, some years later.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, he was an associate and friend of Gov. Waite. I thank the Senator for the correction.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I remember one occasion when I was out in the mountains there was a meeting at Colorado Springs, and both those distinguished gentlemen were in close communication with each other. It was the first time I ever saw either or both of them. I remember Mr. Coates from that time, and I have been somewhat interested in his governmental activities.

Mr. Coates is credited by many with being one of the leading lights in the Non-Partisan League of which Mr. Townley is the head. I do not know whether he is indicted with the rest of the distinguished gentlemen or not for interference with war matters, but at any rate he has received some considerable attention.

I have read the platform of the Non-Partisan League, and it is a very singular affair. It is hedged about with a great many phrases which I think are intended to conceal its main purpose, but lurking through it all there is a sort of a language that reminds me that mentally Mr. Townley and his associates—Mr. Le Seuer, the secretary, I believe, of the organization, and Mr. Coates—are just like Mr. Trotzky. They think the same way, and in their platform concealed carefully are some of the same revolutionary sentiments. The Non-Partisan League later, when it can safely do so or it has enough safety guaranteed to it, will be found producing the same revolutionary principles found in Mr. Trotzky's book headed "Our Revolution." In a speech at Jamestown, N. Dak., June 11, 1917, Mr. Townley said:

> Why should we buy liberty bonds when the Government makes us pay enormous profits for equipment to run our farms? Take the profits from "Big Biz" to pay for the war. We'll never get anything from the Government for anything that we do in this struggle. Why should we help the Government when they wont help us?

This was after the United States declared war. These are some of the men whom our beloved Chief Executive has about him. I think he ought to get rid of them. When you ask me to vote blanket power to a President to transfer functions of the vast, undefined character in this bill I want to know what kind of men he has collected about him to administer the great powers of a free Government. I want some of these distinguished worthies dismissed from their station before I trust more power into the President's hands. If further power serves to collect more such advisors about him, he increases our danger when our supreme test against German arms and German intrigue comes. Government very largely takes its practical aspects from the agents who administer it. You can not separate government from human agency. These mortal habitations of ours that we dwell in for a brief period are the only physical tokens by which practical government is administered among men, and these men the President has about him, and I have not taken them all, but such of them as would illustrate what I meant, are unfit to administer government.

I shall not go into any discussion of the so-called Farmers' Non-Partisan League because that is a matter that would take too much time, but I shall at my conclusion add certain of these documents to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without reading.

I conclude with Mr. Townley with the following statement which illustrates a great deal. He spoke at Butte, Mont., five times with Frank Little, an I. W. W. agitator in that country, to whose subsequent misfortune I need not allude. You know what he was there for. Mr. Townley advocated on the platform in the hearing of living witnesses and by the current press reports from that country the same principles as Frank Little and for which he was hung by an indignant vigilance committee trying to preserve order and avoid bloody ruin in the Butte and surrounding mining country. That is Mr. Townley. That is one time that his camouflage did not hide him. He was caught in bad company, and if Mr. Townley had not been able to buy a railroad ticket and beat a hasty retreat he might not now be president of the Nonpartisan League declaring against various alleged evils in this country.

I shall leave Mr. Townley at this point. Probably I have, to use a homely phrase, dug up more snakes than I can kill now in one day.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator recall the fact that Mr. George Creel had Mr. Townley over here and that he got for him an engagement to speak at Rochester, N. Y., and another to speak in New York City, and afterwards brought him here and took him to the White House?

Mr. SHERMAN. It had escaped my memory until the Senator reminded me of it. I thank him for doing so. I paid my respects to Mr. Creel on several occasions, and I omit him from the roll of honor which I have prepared here. It would be a very pleasing task on some summer afternoon to dissect Mr. Creel. I think as a political anatomist I might possibly do him justice. I could exhibit his framework and motives and the like with probably fair accuracy. He reminds me a good deal when you get to working on him of a letter published in the hitherto unpublished letters of Lincoln. Lincoln wrote a letter to one of his friends once talking about a horse trade. I do not know whether any of you ever read it. It was all new to me. He spoke about the guarantee of a horse in a horse trade. We all know what that means.

The guaranty given would apply to George Creel—warranted "sound in skin and skeleton and free from faults and faculties." That is the utmost that could be said about him by his friends. I do not concede that he has not faults like the rest of us. He has them. But I think some of them are somewhat reprehensible and ought not to be found in a public officer charged with such responsibilities as he has.

Mr. Creel is a Socialist of the most pronounced type. Mr. Creel I have already stated has abused this Government, its Constitution, the conscript fathers who wrote it, the courts of the country that have expounded it, and the judicial tribunal of the United States of last resort, holding its sessions within a few hundred feet of this Senate Chamber, he has denounced as conspirators in the original plan of writing a Constitution by the rich men of the country and then interpreting it and applying it so as to preserve and protect the lawless rights of plutocrats. He ought to be where Trotzky and Lenine are. He deserves honorable mention in "Our Revolution." He has all the elements of a Red, of a destroyer of civil society, one that dissolves all the restraints of communities and the protection of persons and property.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I presume the Senator read an article in the morning paper headed:

SAYS THE MASSES GOT CREEL'S O. K.—NOT A WORD RAISED AGAINST JUNE ISSUE, MANAGER DECLARES.

NEW YORK, April 22.

Circulars which C. Merrill Rogers, as business manager of the Socialist magazine, The Masses, sent to prospective subscribers and to news dealers, in which the writer declared the periodical was going "to fight conscription and its attendant evils," were introduced in evidence to-day at the trial of Rogers, Max Eastman, Arthur Young, and Floyd Dell on charges of conspiring to impede operation of the draft law.

A statement that George Creel, chairman of the Committee on Public Information, approved the publication of one issue of The Masses, a copy of which is in evidence and is alleged to contain matter found objectionable by the Government, was made by Rogers.

In that issue of The Masses was the statement that they were going to fight conscription and its attendant evils.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is entirely in keeping with everything that I ever know George Creel utter on a governmental question. I thank the Senator for adding that to the list of Mr. Creel's qualifications as a public censor that he has already proven to possess.

I am satisfied, taking it in the entirety, that Mr. Creel has indorsed most of the suppressed publications. There are certain ones, though, that have access to the Government postal facilities that I find myself entirely unable to explain. There is one called The Eye Opener, published at North Halstead Street, in Chicago. I have a copy here of the last issue of The Eye Opener. It is certainly an eye opener on Mr. Burleson. It is in open hostility to conscription. It is in open hostility to the prosecution of the war. It is shouting the false cry of peace. Still it has access to the mails. It came to me in my office by the ordinary postal facilities of the country. But it is a good socialistic sheet. It is preaching socialism. It speaks of socialism as the taking over by the Post Office Department of the telegraph and telephone and everything else; anything that does that is instantly shriven of its sin by Mr. Burleson. That is the milk in the Burleson coconut when you get at it.

I found this in the address of my colleague, Senator LEWIS—and I regret he is not here. While we get along very harmoniously in our personal relations, back home we take occasion to differ from each other quite violently at times. He used this expression in his address, found on page 4968 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under date of April 13, 1918, which was the date of the publication. His address was made April 11, 1918:

He—

The President, speaking of him—

has no private purpose to serve; he has no political object to benefit.

Senator LEWIS continues, who undertakes for political advantage to oppose the measures of the President will have an indignant constituency with which to reckon. My colleague [Mr. LEWIS] is one of the ablest men of the Democratic Party in the West.

All of us in our respective constituencies must finally face the multitude; most of us are accustomed to it from early life, and the more the multitude the better. I am willing to face the constituency in which my colleague will, I hope, be a candidate. He deserves, by his distinguished service here, the nomination if he wishes it. I am willing to try it out on the issue which he raises in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I will try it out on the record that has been made up to this time, with such sundry additions as the mistakes of my distinguished colleague and his organization may make hereafter.

When I speak of this in connection with the pending bill, Mr. President, I have no purpose of making a partisan reflection on any of the war powers of the administration in its prosecution of the war. That is a matter that is entirely nonpartisan. There has been no partisan division here on that question, and there will not be. If the President was of my political party, I would differ from him if he undertook to do these things just as often as I differ now. Most of my difficulties in my own country have been because I did not take orders from governors of my own party in that smaller jurisdiction. I would not take a President's order any more than I would take a governor's order. I may be wrong, but I accepted the responsibility for my errors and expiated it by the usual political punishment, if at all, inflicted at the ballot box. I do so now.

I notice on the 13th day of March, 1918, by numerous press reports SCOTT FERRIS, of Oklahoma, Member of the House, chairman of the House Committee on Public Lands, had been elected chairman of the congressional campaign committee, and that it had been organized—he succeeding a former Member of the House—by the election of a full corps of officers. That made a political organization committee all of whom were either Members of the House or holding public office in this administration, whether in the House or elsewhere. I shall insert that in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the appropriate time at the close of my remarks, which I hope to draw to a close very speedily.

Joseph E. Davies resigned from a public position in Washington. In a letter to the President under date of March 12, 1918, he gave his reasons for resigning. He wished to become a candidate in Wisconsin for the Senate. He was nominated by his associates. The President in his reply to him named certain proceedings which are in the letter which I shall ask to be printed in full at the end of my remarks, among which is the McLemore resolution.

"The acid test." I presume I voted myself in favor of the McLemore resolution when it came up through the motions made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. Excepting that I have voted with the President on all the other issues which constituted the acid tests.

I have here a list of those who met the acid test of my Democratic brethren, not of ours, since that is immaterial. I have a list of those voting against the motion to table the McLemore resolution in the House on March 7, 1916, which is one of the "acid tests." All of these on the list here were renominated at their respective party primaries and reelected at the November election, 1916. There is BLACK, of Texas; BUCHANAN, of Texas; CHURCH, of California; DALE, of New York; DECKER, of Missouri; EAGLE, of Texas; FLYNN, of New York; FOSTER, of Illinois; HAMILL, of New Jersey; HENSLEY, of Missouri; KEATING, of Colorado; LOBECK, of Nebraska; MCLEMORE, of Texas; SHALLENBERGER, of Nebraska; SHOUSE, of Kansas; SISSON, of Mississippi; SLAYDEN, of Texas; SMITH, of New York; STEPHENS, of Nebraska; VAN DYKE, of Minnesota. Fitzgerald was elected and resigned to go into a more profitable employment. This is sort of ex cathedra, but I understand it was to become attorney for the Alien Property Custodian, with a guaranty of $15,000, together with such incidental perquisites as will come along in private practice not connected with the public welfare.

As I remember, three others resigned from the House, all of them to take appointments under the city administration in New York of a profitable character. But here is the list, and every one of those Democrats whose names I have read voted against tabling the McLemore resolution. There is MCLEMORE himself. He does not represent a district; he represents the whole State of Texas. The entire dignity and traditions of the Alamo and of the Lone Star centered about his predestined brow. He was nominated in a primary covering the whole State of Texas and elected in the same way, and he is the author of the obnoxious resolution which constitutes an essential element of the acid test.

The gentlemen whose names I have recited are all sitting members of the majority party in the House of Representatives, and all of them voted not to table the McLemore resolution, which was the test in a parliamentary way whether you were for or against the resolution.

Now, here is my esteemed friend William Kent, who used to live in Chicago, and whose father lived there before him, whom I knew, attracted by a genial climate, went farther west than most of us, and he landed in California. I find in the list that Mr. Kent voted against tabling the McLemore resolution. That constituted the acid test. It would not make any difference with Mr. Kent, for he is an independent and votes as he pleases. That means he uses his own judgment on things of that kind, for which I respect him, but it was the acid test applied to him. How was it applied in that liberal, statesmanlike, broad, catholic spirit that led to Mr. Kent's appointment on the Tariff Commission as one of the essential results of the acid test? Thus it is that great reformers by this practical operation of the choice of human agents constantly lose their civic chastity.

Again, the President wrote a letter to the State committee in Newark, N. J., under date of the 21st of March, 1918. In that he set out at some length the necessity of electing Democratic candidates, just as he did in Wisconsin of electing there the Democratic candidate for the Senate, as a means of carrying on the war. I have no objection to prosecuting the war, but in this instance I differ from the President as to how to carry on the war. I insist on electing men of my own political persuasion as one of the proper means of carrying on the war, just as my Democratic brethren have the same right to insist on their method of carrying on the war by electing Democrats. In this he uses the following language—and I shall insert all of this at the end of my address as well as the others I have referred to:

The old party slogans have lost their significance and will mean nothing to the voter of the future, for the war is certain to change the mind of Europe as well as the mind of America. Men everywhere are searching democratic principles to their hearts in order to determine their soundness, their sincerity, their adaptability to the real needs of their life, and every man with any vision must see that the real test of justice and right action is presently to come as it never came before. The men in the trenches, who have been freed from the economic serfdom to which some of them had been accustomed, will, it is likely, return to their homes with a new view and a new impatience of all mere political phrases, and will demand real thinking and sincere action.

What does that mean, if it means anything? "Economic serfdom!" What soldier ever was in economic serfdom before the war? What man was in economic serfdom? Who was oppressing them? There was no oppression in this country except as Mr. Trotzky sees it.

I can understand why the President is tolerant with this group of single taxers, of these economic freaks of all kinds with which he has surrounded himself; those of various kinds of opinions, infested with vagaries of all their species, gentlemen who have hobbies which they mount and ride persistently, reaching nowhere, it is true, but in the main creating a most infernal din about the Executive ears, making it impossible for him to obtain a clear hearing on the current issues of the day. Economic serfdom! That sounds like Trotzky; that sounds like "our Revolution"; and I can understand why this peculiar bunch of mysterious wizards are about the President and why he tolerates them. It is because they pour into his willing ears the stories of "economic serfdom." I suppose after a while they will be talking about "our Revolution," at the opportune moment.

These things preceded the nomination of Mr. Davies. Then, our respected Vice President—for whose fairness as a presiding officer I have the greatest admiration and respect—became interested. He took it upon himself—which was entirely proper—to go to the State of Wisconsin in Mr. Davies's behalf. I can excuse him for doing so. He was requested, no doubt, by the proper campaign authorities to pursue this line of activity. He is a strong campaigner and a party leader. Then, who could resist following the parti-colored oriflamme of my beloved colleague [Mr. LEWIS], who had preceded him in that part of the country, shouting the familiar slogan, "Stand by the President and stand by the war"? He would inspire to action the most phlegmatic or indifferent by his ringing appeal. So the Vice President made his appearance. At Madison he used this language—and I verified it; it was the usual press report that went out from the Associated Press, and the local papers published it as well, both in Milwaukee and in Madison:

Our State of Wisconsin is under suspicion. The law of politics is that so far as usefulness is concerned you may as well have a bad character as to have a bad reputation. You Republicans have made the issue here in Wisconsin. If the vote at the primary is based upon the charges and counter charges that you have made against one another, you are about half for America, half for the Kaiser, and all against Wilson.

Your self-appointed leaders are now trying to convince the loyal half that the really important thing is not loyalty or disloyalty but party success. Having purified the stream in the primary you welcome the sewage to help you over the election.

My beloved colleague [Mr. LEWIS], speaking at Appleton, Wis., said:

The President at this crisis is entitled to one of his party organization and one who is his personal friend. Will Wisconsin not yield of party pride to do this bit of political patriotism in this hour calling for sacrifice that the Nation may be saved?

Saved by electing the Democratic ticket! You can not wage the war except by electing Democrats. Well, everybody knows on this side of the Chamber that there is no issue of that kind raised; so do my good friends on the Democratic side of the Chamber know it. They do not talk that here to any of us; they know better. There is not a vestige of politics here on war questions, but on consolidation bills of this kind that are presented here, with these blanket powers, we want to know that the executive department will not consider that the exercise of these powers is necessary in a partisan way in order to meet the emergencies of the great campaign. I want to know when this happens whether the departments here, under this measure, will be consolidated into one or two men—the Secretary of the Treasury, the Federal Reserve Board, the national banks, the public utilities, the War Finance Commission, the Panama Canal, 250,000 miles of railway, and the industrial enterprises of the country? Shall all of them be united in one head?

The Secretary of the Treasury was in Texas a few days ago. The head of this mighty and potential enterprise visited all of the people; and men, women, and children with loud acclaim heard him and saw him. He has been in various parts of the United States. The convention of lecturers was here on the occasion when Mr. Creel delivered himself of his civic beatitudes.

Do you know what a number of them were doing in the back rooms in Washington? They were going over a political catechism; they were using their activities for war bonds to conceal their political activities, and they had a general review, and they are preaching it now and using it. I do not blame them for it; it is not the primary purpose, it is true, which is to sell bonds. I suppose the Republicans are going around on the same mission to see their political friends. One is no better than the other in that particular. I allude to it for the purpose of showing that under the blanket powers of this bill the Secretary of the Treasury may seize, by an Executive order, all these lines of activity. Then, when that is done, what will be the result? I am moved in a somewhat irreverent way to say, when that is carried out public office becomes a family trust.

Again, after the election was over, after the cry of the combat had died away, after the captains and the kings had departed, after the tumults of the great deep were stilled and the returns were all in, of course there is always a post-mortem to be held. It would have been a good deal better to have followed in that particular the advice of an old country doctor, when he said it was a good deal better to hold a diagnosis before an operation than it was a funeral after you had performed one. Ignoring this a political disaster resulted in Wisconsin. It shows, Mr. President, that these outside organizations persist in thrusting partisan politics into these affairs. After Senator LENROOT was elected this was given out by the national Democratic committee:

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL BODY DECLARES LENROOT WON BY LA FOLLETTE MEN'S VOTES.

A press dispatch from Milwaukee says that Mr. Davies, the Democratic candidate for United States Senator, sent the following message to Mr. LENROOT yesterday, congratulating him on his election:

"Present returns indicate your election. Please accept my personal congratulations upon this great opportunity thus afforded to you for service to our State and to our common country in these serious and momentous times."

The following statement, on behalf of the Democratic national committee, authorized by the chairman, was given out at the national headquarters of the committee last night:

"Wisconsin is heavily Republican when the LA FOLLETTE faction is cooperating with the 'stalwarts.' The senatorial primary vote demonstrated that these factions were about evenly divided; hence Mr. LENROOT, the nominee, recognized that he could not be elected without securing the LA FOLLETTE vote which had been cast for Thompson in the primary.

"In the primary contest Mr. LENROOT made his fight upon the 'loyalty' issue. After the primary he and his supporters sought to bring both factions together in complete accord, arousing partisan feeling in every possible way, even to the extent of courting the LA FOLLETTE and pro-German vote within the Republican ranks.

ACCUSE NATIONAL ORGANIZATION.

"Authoritative statements in eastern newspapers assert that this change of tactics by Mr. LENROOT was advised by the Republican national organization. The circumstances of the case need no comment. It is sufficient to say that if the national advisers of Mr. LENROOT deem party unity so essential that they are willing to advise compromises with and concessions to Mr. LA FOLLETTE and his associates, success in Wisconsin won in that way will prove a very costly victory.

"We are gratified that Mr. Davies made no overtures for the support of the pro-German vote, offering no opportunity for its cooperation and deliberately spurning it throughout his entire campaign. He stood for 100 per cent Americanism and typifies that character of one citizenship, whether in Wisconsin or in any other State. The Wisconsin campaign has made the issue and we welcome it. This issue, which brought victory of doubtful value in this contest, will return again and yet again to plague those who have made it."

So that these political issues are injected not with our consent but in spite of it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SHERMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. FALL. Before the Senator leaves this particular subject, as the Senator's fund of information is so enormous upon almost all subjects of our contemporaneous history, particularly political history, I wish to refresh the Senator's memory by a suggestion from the declarations of one of our great writers, Dr. Woodrow Wilson, upon the subject which he has just been discussing, namely, the interference of the President in the matter of elections. In his Constitutional Government, on pages 71 and 72, I find the following, and I simply wish to call it to the attention of the Senator, because I know he is familiar with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. FALL. In that work the distinguished author says:

There are illegitimate means by which the President may influence the action of Congress. He may bargain with Members not only with regard to appointments, but also with regard to legislative measures. He may use his local patronage to assist Members to get or retain their seats. He may interpose his powerful influence, in one covert way or another, in contests for places in the Senate. He may also overbear Congress by arbitrary acts which ignore the laws or virtually override them. Such things are not only deeply immoral, they are destructive of the fundamental understandings of constitutional government and, therefore, of constitutional government itself. They are sure, moreover, in a country of free public opinion, to bring their own punishment, to destroy both the fame and the power of the man who dares to practice them. No honorable man includes such agencies in a sober exposition of the Constitution or allows himself to think of them when he speaks of the influences of "life" which govern each generation's use and interpretation of that great instrument, our sovereign guide, and the object of our deepest reverence.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am very glad to have that added to the comments I have been making, and I thank the Senator from New Mexico for producing it; it is material. I have no criticism to make of the President for departing from the salutary doctrine announced. I have known a good many persons who write one way and act another. In his early life I knew a spring poet to do the same thing. He wrote beautiful poetry, but he married a widow, and after that he became very prosaic and practical. He took what Tony Weller, in the Pickwick Papers, calls "the cure for the gout," and it cured him completely. Senators remember that Weller on one occasion made the remark that he had a sovereign remedy for the gout. Mr. Pickwick pulled out his memorandum book, got his pencil, and said: "A sovereign remedy for the gout! Let me have it please." He was suffering very much from the gout himself; he was a good liver, as Senators will remember, and he always traveled with a well-filled hamper of his own. He began to prepare for the memorandum. Weller said: "Widders will cure it. Gout is a disease as arises from too much ease and jollity. Just marry a widder with a strong voice with a decent notion of using it and you'll never have the gout again. Widders, taken regularly, will cure it, because you will never have any more after you take them. I take 'em regularly." So the poet was cured.

Electing a man President of the United States will cure him of the vagaries he had as an author; that is perfectly natural. I do not criticize the President on that account; it is only human nature. When a man sits down in his study, having had no experience, and writes something he very largely theorizes, but when he begins to act with human beings he finds that many theories will not work; you can not make human beings fit theories; you must make theories fit the human being. That is what our President is doing now; he has turned around and reversed operations in his dealings with men. Most of us by the time we reach this body or other public office are, for better or for worse, what we have grown to be; we are not going to change; we will do the best we can with the talents our Maker has given us, but one must take men as he finds them.

So the President is doing the best he can. What I want him to do is to scatter this bunch of economic fakirs and howling dervishes that he has around him now—firebrands and pestilential fiends of sedition themselves. Alien and sedition act! Why, what the President wants is not more legislation, but he wants to use the powers he has now to get the instruments of sedition away from him. Why does not he instruct his Attorney General to inject vigor into his prosecutions? That will do more good than 100,000 hardened troops around Washington now, and more than a million later on after the Bolsheviki has been well organized in this country and our revolution may be duplicating what Mr. Trotzky framed up in his country. The Attorney General lacks drive. He prosecutes the little offenders—the big ones escape.

Recurring again to this political matter, here is a document that was placed in the RECORD by a Representative from Wisconsin which I think is not justified as a matter of campaigning; and I have a right in connection with a bill of this kind, inasmuch as power has been used in that way, to think that the power delegated by this bill might be used improperly. Here is a circular, or an advertisement, from the columns of a Rockford, Ill., paper—and Rockford is near Camp Grant—which was addressed to the Wisconsin soldiers at Camp Grant.

This advertisement was published without any signature. In Wisconsin the person who inserted that would go to jail under the law if he published such a statement without giving the name of the man behind it. The advertisement is as follows:

Tuesday, April 2, you are entitled to vote for United States Senator from Wisconsin to succeed Senator Paul O. Husting. President Wilson, your Commander in Chief, desires all loyal Americans to vote for Joseph E. Davies for United States Senator.

Davies's election means joy at Washington and gloom at Berlin.
Davies's defeat means gloom at Washington and joy at Berlin.

The soldier vote of Wisconsin cast in Camp Grant, near Rockford, where this paper was sent as part of the Democratic campaign, is as follows:

Lenroot	576
Davies	403
Berger	85

I do not think that is justifiable as a matter of campaigning; not even in the exigencies of partisan politics do I think that a thing like that ought to be permitted. The President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. In the command of the Army or Navy and in the conduct of the campaign, after the choice of officers, and in all the details of military operations, the President's will is supreme and must by the nature of things be supreme; but yielding to him all that goes with the great war powers of the country, yet in civil affairs he has no more, and his friends have no more, right to thrust himself as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy than he has a right to court-martial me and shoot me at sunrise to-morrow morning. Such action is absolutely unjustified in the partisan politics of this country. I repeat, Mr. President, the acid test was designed to apply to Republicans and never to apply to Democrats. That is the grossly partisan way in which the Executive administers power when it relates to a political campaign. We interpret a grant of more power by how present power is abused.

Mr. President, I do not care to take more time. This bill, with its vast possibilities of potential mischief, if administered along the lines I have already illustrated, by the appointment of men, by the transfer of functions, could at best only aggravate, unless the Executive changes his appointments and his view of things, the evils which already exist.

I have made these criticisms in a kindly spirit and for the sole purpose of reminding not only the Members of the Senate but the general public as well that the men whom the President has collected about him are those from whom he can not get desirable results in government.

I ask that the various documents to which I have referred may be printed at length at the end of my remarks, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the request will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FORGET PARTY, WILSON TELLS NEW JERSEY DEMOCRATS—DROP OLD SLOGANS AND WORK FOR HUMANITY, HE URGES THEM—MEETING AT NEWARK—TUMULTY CARRIES MESSAGE OF GREATER EFFORTS FOR THE AVERAGE MAN.

NEWARK, N. J., March 20.

President Wilson to-day called the Democrats of New Jersey to forget old party interests and selfish aims and to unite in their efforts to deal fairness to the average man, the man without influence or privilege. Such a political program there must be, said the President, in line with the increasing growth of real democracy in the world.

The President's appeal to Democratic disinterestedness in purely party affairs was included in a letter to the Democratic State Committee meeting here to-day to discuss party reorganization. The "reorganization banquet," held to-night, was addressed by Joseph P. Tumulty, secretary to President Wilson.

The President's letter, pointing to the revolutionary changes now taking place in political thought and the need for true democracy, follows:

WILSON CALLS ON DEMOCRATS.

THE WHITE HOUSE, Washington.

MY DEAR MR. TOASTMASTER: I sincerely regret that matters of pressing importance will prevent my taking part in the reorganization banquet to which you have generously invited me. It is my feeling, as I am sure it will be the feeling of those present, that my clear duty is to stay here on the job. My work can be properly done only if I devote my whole thought and attention to it and think of nothing but the immediate task in hand.

At the same time it is clear that in the present posture of affairs in New Jersey I can not overlook my responsibility as leader of a great party, and that it is my privilege to point out what I believe to be the duty of the Democrats in New Jersey, now and in the months to come, in order that the exigency of a great hour of crisis may properly be met.

During the months that I had the privilege of serving the people of New Jersey in the office of governor we sought to accomplish this definite purpose, namely, to open the processes of government to the access and inspection of every citizen in order that the people might feel that the government of New Jersey represented their hopes, their impulses, and their sympathies.

It was with this great purpose in mind that we succeeded in establishing electoral machinery which took away from selfish political leaders the power to hold the mass of the party voters of the State in subjection to themselves.

In the matter of employers' liability, we substituted for the cold letter of the old law the warm and wholesome tonic of a humane statute.

In every act of legislation we cut a clear pathway of public service and achieved a record remarkable for its variety and humanity, in every way comprehensive in character and touching no vital interest in the State with a spirit of injustice or demagogy.

We gave the people, after many tedious and discouraging years of waiting, a government which they could feel was their own, free and unhampered by special privilege.

A time of grave crisis has come in the life of the Democratic Party in New Jersey, a time when its friends and supporters must face the facts of the situation if they would serve the cause of free government in New Jersey. Every sign of these terrible days of war and revolutionary change, when economic and social forces are being released upon the world whose effect no political seer dare venture to conjecture, bids us search our hearts through and through and make them ready for the birth of a new day, a day we hope and believe of greater opportunity and greater prosperity for the average mass of struggling men and women, and of greater safety and opportunity for children.

OLD PARTY SLOGANS ARE GONE.

The old party slogans have lost their significance and will mean nothing to the voter of the future, for the war is certain to change the mind of Europe as well as the mind of America. Men everywhere are searching democratic principles to their hearts in order to determine their soundness, their sincerity, their adaptability to the real needs of their life, and every man with any vision must see that the real test of justice and right action is presently to come as it never came before. The men in the trenches, who have been freed from the economic serfdom to which some of them had been accustomed, will, it is likely, return to their homes with a new view and a new impatience of all mere political phrases, and will demand real thinking and sincere action.

Let the Democratic Party in New Jersey therefore forget everything but the new service which it is to be called upon to render. The days of political and economic reconstruction which are ahead of us no man can now definitely assess, but we know this: That every program must be shot through and through with utter disinterestedness; that no party must try to serve itself, but every party must try to serve humanity, and that the task is a very practical one, meaning that every program, every measure in every program, must be tested by this question and this question only:

Is it just; is it for the benefit of the average man, without influence or privilege; does it embody in real fact the highest conception of social justice and of right dealing without respect of person or class or particular interest? This is a high test. It can be met only by those who have genuine sympathy with the mass of men and real insight into their needs and opportunities and a purpose which is purged alike of selfish and of partisan intention. The party which rises to this test will receive the support of the people because it deserves it.

Very sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

DAVIES'S LETTER TO PRESIDENT.

In his letter of resignation Mr. Davies said:

"I feel sure that you would know that no selfish reason could impel me to resign at this time

"My conviction is that I can give a greater service to my country, to my State, and to you by entering into the contest for the United States senatorship in Wisconsin. The pride in and my affection for the State of my birth have caused me to resent deeply the misrepresentations which have led many to believe that the State of Wisconsin was not as fully loyal to the country as her sister Commonwealths.

"At the special election on April 2 Wisconsin will demonstrate that she stands with her sister States four square in loyalty, supporting the President of the United States in the vigorous prosecution of this war. Wisconsin is loyal and stands behind you. The issue will be clean cut. I deem it a great and rare privilege to be permitted to engage in this fight for such a cause. Wisconsin will demonstrate at the special election on April 2 that a united Nation stands behind you."

WILSON LETTER TO DAVIES.

On March 12, 1918, Mr. Davies wrote the President a letter resigning from the Federal Trade Commission. Mr. Wilson accepted the resignation to-day in the following letter:

"MARCH 20, 1918.

"MY DEAR MR. DAVIES: This acknowledges your letter of March 12. It is with sincere regret that I accept your resignation as a member of the Federal Trade Commission, but I must commend the patriotic impulse which urges that action on your part. May I not express to you my warm appreciation of your sympathetic cooperation during the early part of this administration in bringing about the adoption of all those measures which we had promised the people and which I have an abiding confidence will ultimately redound to their lasting benefit?

"THANKS FOR HELP GIVEN.

"May I also add a word of thanks to you for your steadfast loyalty and patriotism during that trying period before we were thrust into the war, while, to avoid becoming involved therein, every effort was being made aggressively to assert and fearlessly to maintain American rights.

"The McLemore resolution, the embargo issue, and the armed neutrality measure presented the first opportunities to apply the acid test in our country to disclose true loyalty and genuine Americanism."

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 13, 1918.]

DEMOCRATS ELECT FERRIS AS LEADER—OKLAHOMAN NEW CHAIRMAN OF CONGRESSIONAL CAMPAIGN.

Representative SCOTT FERRIS, of Oklahoma, chairman of the House Public Lands Committee since the Democrats gained control, was elected last night chairman of the Democratic congressional campaign committee. He succeeds Representative FRANK E. DOREMUS, of Michigan, who, after piloting two congressional campaigns, announced he could no longer serve because his time would be taken up by other congressional activities.

The committee reorganized and elected these vice chairmen: Senators SHAFROTH, Colorado; SHIELDS, Tennessee; and THOMPSON, Kansas; Representatives WEBB, North Carolina; GANDY, South Dakota; BAKER, Colorado; and COX, Indiana. Representative LONERGAN, Connecticut, was chosen secretary; South Trimble, Kentucky, Clerk of the House, was continued as assistant secretary and Joseph J. Sinnott, of Virginia, House Doorkeeper, as sergeant at arms.

Mr. FERRIS and Mr. DOREMUS expressed full confidence of the party's success at the polls next fall. There will be another meeting April 5.

Mr. SHERMAN. From the National Republican, edited by George B. Lockwood, at Washington, D. C., I take the following, showing the steady pursuit of political advantage by Democrats while Republicans are assured we must be nonpartisan:

DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL LEADERS PRACTICE PARTISANSHIP THEY DECRY IN THE REPUBLICAN PARTY IN THE MIDST OF FOREIGN WAR.

STATEMENT GIVEN OUT OCTOBER 16, 1917.

While the cry is being raised that Republicans should at this time entirely forget the interests of their party, on the assumption that Republican activity at this time is unpatriotic, the Democratic national organization is active to an unprecedented degree. The chairman of the Democratic national committee is Vance McCormick, recently named by President Wilson chairman of the national export council. His presence in Washington seems to have stimulated Democratic national activities. Some 40 employees are busy at Democratic national headquarters in the Woodward Building at Washington. The following bulletin was recently put out by the Democratic national committee, showing what the Democratic leaders are doing while they are decrying Republican organization activity as "unpatriotic":

"WASHINGTON, October 16.

"A regional system of organization recently adopted by the executive committee of the Democratic national committee for use in the future campaigns will be considered at a series of zone meetings to be held in various parts of the country, beginning this week.

"The first meeting will be held at the Brown Palace Hotel in Denver on Wednesday, October 17, and the second at the Parker House in Boston next Monday, October 22. Dates of the other meetings will be announced later.

"The plan is to organize the national committee into eight subcommittees, each of which will choose its regional chairman and perhaps establish zone headquarters.

"W. R. Hollister, assistant secretary, and W. D. Jamieson, assistant treasurer of the national committee, who are the directors of the permanent Democratic national organization in Washington, will attend the regional meeting and consult with the national committeemen and State chairmen in the different zones.

"Following is the system under which the country has been divided under the new plan, which establishes an innovation in major political party management:

"Zone 1: Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Vermont.

"Zone 2: Connecticut, New Jersey, New York, and Porto Rico.

"Zone 3: Delaware, District of Columbia, Maryland, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and West Virginia.

"Zone 4: Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Wisconsin.

"Zone 5: Alabama, Florida, Georgia, and North Carolina.

"Zone 6: Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Oklahoma, Tennessee, and Texas.

"Zone 7: Colorado, Idaho, Montana, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming.

"Zone 8: Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Nevada, Oregon, Philippines, and Washington.

"National committeemen representing the States and Territories in the various zones, under the new system, will cooperate in the direction of future campaigns in their respective regions, while all of the subcommittees will operate under the supervision of the permanent headquarters of the national committee in Washington.

"Under this announced plan meetings are being held throughout the country preliminary to the congressional campaign of 1918 by Democratic leaders. The following account of a meeting held in New England, taken from the Boston Globe of October 23, is typical:

"'Prominent Democrats representing State and national organizations of New England met at the Parker House yesterday and formed an organization which, it is believed, will enable the Democrats of New England to look after local political affairs and present their needs to the national organization of the party more effectively than in the past. New England headquarters will probably be opened in Boston before the opening of the congressional campaign of 1918.

"'The New England district, the second to be organized, consists of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. At the meeting to-day Dr. John W. Coughlin, of Fall River, was elected chairman and Francis E. Sullivan, of Providence, secretary.

"'Those present were Senator HENRY F. HOLLIS and Alexander Murchie, of New Hampshire; William R. Pattangall, of Maine; Francis E. Sullivan, chairman of the Rhode Island State committee; Patrick H. Quinn, the Connecticut member of the Democratic national committee; James E. Kennely, the Vermont member of the national committee; Michael A. O'Leary, chairman of the Massachusetts State committee; Marcus A. Coolidge, of Fitchburg; and W. R. Hollister, assistant secretary of the Democratic national committee.'"

The article in The Public, of December 21, 1917, relating to, apologizing for, and defending the I. W. W., is as follows:

THE WRONG WAY OUT.

The I. W. W. is to have its day in court, not alone in the Federal and State tribunals, where some of its members are called upon to answer to the charge of certain alleged crimes or misdemeanors, but in that larger court of public opinion, where the oppressed calls upon the oppressor to justify his acts. Whether or not these charges be proven, there will still remain the fact that society has been guilty of a grievous wrong, not only to those who call themselves the Industrial Workers of the World but to a vastly larger number of men and women who have had small share in the benefits of modern civilization. Some of these victims are unconscious of the wrong that has been done them because fortuitous circumstances have thus far prevented them from feeling its full force; others look upon it as a hazard of life that chance may perhaps correct; but a third class, the very nethermost stratum of society, feels the wrong and cries out against it, without knowing how to make its protest effective.

If short-sighted leaders of oppressed people are too hasty in appealing to force, what shall be said of those persons who are indifferent to the conditions that lead to the oppression? It is not to be expected that the villagers and farmers of Iowa or Georgia shall be well informed as to conditions among the miners of Michigan or Arizona, nor are the hop pickers of California and the garment makers of New York likely to have an intimate acquaintance with each other's needs. There are, however, individuals, officials, and societies who can know these things and who, it would seem, should consider it their duty to know them. Men and women who have assumed the rôle of social knight-errantry would there meet foemen worthy of their steel. Officials charged with public order should find it worth their while to look into labor conditions before the outbreak occurs. And societies, leagues, and institutions in great numbers—not omitting the churches—that have volunteered their services to the poor and helpless might well inquire the cause of poverty in the midst of plenty. Any and all of these are ready enough to make investigations and render reports after there has been an outbreak and loss of life; why should they so often delay action till after the machine gun has done its work?

A great obligation rests upon those who enjoy the opportunity for action and have the power to do. Their responsibility, though not so sharply defined, is not less than that of the desperate men who as a last resort appeal to force. They should know that riots are not primarily due to leaders, but to conditions, and that violence occurs only when the victims have come to feel there is no other way out. It is not necessary to assume that the I. W. W. leaders are wise or honest or otherwise fitted for leadership before giving them a hearing. Be they all that they are charged, still they should be heard. Should they really be unworthy, nothing will make the fact so clear, both to their followers and to the country at large, as a public hearing. To teachers of physical force it may be said that progress lies along the lines of evolution; to the defenders of things as they are it may be said that when these lines are too much clogged it leads to revolution. And though revolution be all but impossible in a country having manhood suffrage, unredressed wrongs incline many toward it and now and again tempt some to try it. The I. W. W. have taken the first step. Sabotage has arrested attention. It is known that a grievance exists. It is now clear to those who will see that unorganized labor in callings not immediately under the eye of society has had to bear the brunt of an unnatural and unjust industrial system. That condition, onerous to the last degree in times of peace, has now become unendurable.

Indiscretions, or even criminal acts, on the part of leaders can not be made to serve as an excuse for summarily condemning the whole movement. It is not enough to show that sabotage on the part of workmen is wrong. It must be made just as clear that sabotage on the part of the beneficiaries of privilege is equally wrong. The man who cripples the hoisting machinery in a coal pit interrupts production, but the man who holds coal land idle for speculative purposes hinders production far more. The same is true of every idle acre, of every vacant lot, of every undeveloped power site, of every unused natural resource. Nay, it is true of every owner of natural resources who charges others for their use. Mark Twain used to say there were two Reigns of Terror in France—the thousand years of privation and suffering of the masses and the few days of upheaval that ended it. The same thing might be said of sabotage. It has been practiced time out of mind by those who own the earth. By this means most of the advantages of science and invention have been withheld from labor. And now that the victims of these unjust conditions are resorting in their desperation to the cruder forms of sabotage a hue and cry is raised to punish the perpetrators instead of removing the cause. Let us have done with all sabotage and establish economic justice.

The foregoing absolves all from responsibility for his acts. There is no such thing as crime, and so forth:

MADISON, WIS., March 27.

Vice President THOMAS R. MARSHALL opened his speaking campaign in behalf of Joseph E. Davies, Democratic candidate for United States Senator in Wisconsin, here last night by appealing to Republicans to cast their votes for Davies.

"I come to Wisconsin to learn whether 100,000 Republicans will not count the loss of partisanship cheap if thereby Wisconsin may be saved to the Union," the Vice President said.

"No Republican can come to the Senate from the State of Wisconsin without a feeling on the part of the Imperial German Government that that Senator, having changed his mind once, may, by the shifting of a few hundred votes in Wisconsin, be induced to change it again. Your State is under suspicion. You Republicans have made the issue here in Wisconsin."

ALL AGAINST WILSON.

"If the vote at the primary is based upon the charges and countercharges which you have made each against the other you are about half for America, half for the Kaiser, and all against Wilson. Your self-appointed leaders are now trying to convince the loyal half that the really important thing is not loyalty or disloyalty, but party success.

"Having purified the stream in the primary, you welcome the sewage to help you over the election. I think there are large numbers of you who will not want to rest under such a suspicion.

"It makes no difference how pure and patriotic the purposes of the Republican candidate may be, to be elected he is now bidding for the vote of the German sympathizer, for the vote of the traitor, for the vote of the seditionist, for the vote of the pacifist, for the vote of the man so hidebound in politics that he rejoices at every mistake made by the President or his advisers, for the vote of the man willing to make an inglorious peace, for the vote of the disappointed profiteer, and the vote of the man who wanted our citizens and our ships to stay off the high seas, and who wanted an embargo placed upon the sale of munitions of war in the markets of the world.

DOES NOT SEEK VOTE.

"By these votes, and these votes alone, can the Republican candidate hope to be elected, for Mr. Davies does not seek them and would, I believe, scorn to receive them. It is up to you, Mr. Loyal Republican, to answer whether you are for the party or whether you are for the State.

"Wisconsin is not only on trial before America; the Republicans of Wisconsin are on trial before the world. No Republican, as disclosed by the primaries, can be elected to the Senate of the United States without receiving votes which in the primary were characterized as 'disloyal' votes."

["Our State of Wisconsin is under suspicion. The law of politics is that, so far as usefulness is concerned, you may as well have a bad character as to have a bad reputation. You Republicans have made the issue here in Wisconsin. If the vote at the primary is based upon the charges and countercharges that you have made against one another, you are about half for America, half for the Kaiser, and all against Wilson.

"Your self-appointed leaders are now trying to convince the loyal half that the really important thing is not loyalty or disloyalty, but party success. Having purified the stream in the primary, you welcome the sewage to help you over the election."]

"GIVE WILSON HIS FRIEND."

United States Senator JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, speaking at Appleton, said: ["The President at this crisis is entitled to one of his party organization and one who is his personal friend. Will Wisconsin not yield of party pride to do this bit of political patriotism in this hour calling for sacrifice that the Nation may be saved?"]

From an I. W. W. pamphlet I extract the following which gives its definition of "economic serfdom." It proclaims a class struggle until the I. W. W.'s take possession of the earth and the machinery of production and abolish the wage system. It believes in direct action like Trotzky to whose soviet the President unfortunately sent his cablegram:

MAKING HISTORY.

On September 28, 1917, a climax of that conspiracy was reached when a Federal grand jury, convoked for that especial purpose and assisted by the shrewdest legal talent of the United States Government, returned indictments against 166 officers, members, and sympathizers of the Industrial Workers of the World. North, South, East and West they are now being arrested and brought in irons to Chicago for trial on the general charge of conspiracy. Organized labor is pitted against organized capital in the greatest contest of history, and to imperialistic capital it shall be a Waterloo of wealth or for the spartan I. W. W. it shall mean a Thermopylæ of labor.

WHAT IS THE I. W. W.?

The I. W. W. is a labor union admitting any wageworker. It is based upon "the class struggle" and acts through "industrial unionism." It declares that "the working class and the employing class have nothing in common. There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of working people, while the few who make up the employing class have all the good things of life. Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth and the machinery of production, and abolish the wage system."

It says 'labor is entitled to all it produces," and to get it or any partial increase industrial unionism is needed. "All workers in an industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all." Every worker in any section of an industry is organized in a branch of an industrial union of all the workers in that industry. These industrial unions are grouped into industrial departments of connecting or kindred industries, while all are brought together in one big union of all the workers of all the world—the I. W. W. Workers, not officials, call strikes on or off. All power thereby remains in the hands of the man on the job.

The I. W. W. knows what it wants and how to get it. A real democracy in action. It is the best loved and most hated—the most vital organization in existence.

Another Industrial Worker of the World document says, referring to those now on trial in Chicago for obstructing the war:

To-day the greatest drama in the history of labor is being staged in this country. It's the right to organize and strike versus the right to slave. Organized capital has succeeded in having indicted 166 members and sympathizers of the Industrial Workers of the World because of their activities in organizing the workers and demanding decent living conditions. They are awaiting trial, and funds are needed for defense. Which side are you on?

Contributors will receive receipt for each remittance, and at close of trials an itemized accounting of all funds. Make all money orders and checks payable to the undersigned. Act now.

GENERAL DEFENSE COMMITTEE,
WILLIAM D. HAYWOOD, Treasurer,
1901 West Madison Street, Chicago, Ill.

This is more "economic serfdom."

Another Industrial Worker of the World reprints an editorial from The Public of November 16, 1917, which practically absolves these apostles of violence from responsibility. It is more "economic serfdom."

[Editorial in The Public, Nov. 16, 1917.]

PLAYING WITH DYNAMITE.

Professional detectives and the well-meaning assistant prosecutors of the Department of Justice should not be given a free hand in handling the I. W. W. situation. There is evidence that they are as ignorant of American sociology as were the advisers of Louis XVI of French sociology. And they are aided and abetted in their ignorance by an equally ignorant press, so that nothing but approving comment follows the most stupid and dangerous tactics. The situation in this country with respect to unskilled and unorganized labor is full of dynamite. Every trade-union leader knows it. The President knows it. It is the dynamite engendered by the existence of a large class conscious of injustice, burning with resentment, and wholly without organization through which to express itself. The I. W. W. does not represent it in any authorized way. But it comes nearer being its spokesman than any other organization. Members of the I. W. W. or men who have been profoundly influenced by their propaganda may be found in every unorganized labor force in the country. The I. W. W. is not an organization so much as it is a spirit and a vocabulary. And because no strike or audible protest follows the various assaults on I. W. W. leaders, let us not be too sure that their influence is negligible; that the department's policy and that of the mobs that get encouragement from this policy is not breeding a slow, dangerous, smoldering resentment.

An instant retaliation would be far less dangerous, much easier to handle, than a spirit that may at some critical juncture in the future flare out in a strike of steel workers or slaughterhouse workers or miners or oil refiners. No one knows about this. Perhaps the Government can imprison or mobs horsewhip every laborer in the country who sympathizes with the I. W. W., and our unorganized, unskilled, exploited wageworkers will take it lying down. Perhaps they will not. But the situation should not be handled by men who have never read, let alone pondered, the Government reports that show that hardly more than half of the adult male wage earners in the United States earn enough in a year to support a family in decency and comfort. The I. W. W. leaders now in jail know those reports by heart. They have passed them on to tens of thousands of men, and they have interpreted them with the aid of the writings of such men as Thorstein Veblen and Leo Tolstoy and Henry George. Their movement is interpreted sympathetically and accepted as an inevitable product of existing conditions by such first-hand observers as Dr. Carleton Parker, dean of the School of Business and professor of economics at the University of Washington, and the Rev. Dr. Sydney Strong, of Seattle, a Congregational minister and a sociologist of character and standing. There is in existence a printed report of the testimony given by Mr. Herbert Quick, now Federal farm-loan commissioner, in which the condition of millions of migratory farm laborers in this country is presented in words that make it perfectly clear why, in H. G. Wells's phrase, these men are among our "disaffected employees." Mr. Quick placed the blame largely on a system of land tenure and land taxation that plays into the hands of monopolists and beneficiaries of privilege.

Just a suggestion of the way in which I. W. W.'s are produced is found in experience of harvest hands with our railroads and local authorities. At the beginning of the harvest, the word goes out to trainmen that "hoboes" are to be unmolested. They go into the harvest without funds, and their labor is a vital community need. After the crops are harvested the attitude of town authorities and railroad officials suddenly changes. The harvest hands straightaway become "bums." They are arrested, thrown into jail, and fined. They are kicked off railroad trains unless they pay fare or its equivalent. This is a situation described minutely enough in Government reports, and it is only one of a hundred true stories that help to explain the I. W. W.

But to assault the I. W. W., as a whole, is to assault the only spokesmen and to suppress the only articulation possessed by a class of wageworkers on which several of our most vital basic industries are utterly dependent—a class numbering many millions of men. Why this class is represented by men who repudiate patriotism, religion, and government is a long story. It is well told by Dr. Parker in the current Atlantic. It involves the shortcomings of the trade-union movement as well as the upgrowth of conditions that leave large bodies of workers with no gratitude to established institutions, because those institutions have done nothing for them except to cut them off from about everything that makes life on this earth worth while.

But, some one will say, surely the responsible Federal authorities know what they are doing. They must have evidence. Among those arrested with the others for seditious conspiracy was Arturo Giovannitti, one of the leaders in the Lawrence strike of nearly six years ago. He is an Italian whose international ideals had not succeeded in smothering his nationalist sentiment. He is a poet of distinction. His work has been highly praised by the London Times and published in the Atlantic Monthly.

For the past year he has been writing plays and poems and living quietly in New York. Five years ago he translated a work on sabotage. For this he has received no royalties, nor has he owned or circulated so much as one copy of the volume. Yet he is seized and taken to the Tombs and must now submit to removal to Chicago and trial there in an atmosphere poisoned by prejudice. As for the charge, freely given to the press at Washington, that proof had been found that the organization was being financed by German money, not a line of evidence has since been produced to substantiate these vague, sensational intimations supposedly given out by Mr. Gregory's assistants and spread in flaming headlines on the first page of every newspaper in the country. On the contrary, the indictment as published contains no charge that German money played a part in the organization's activities. William D. Haywood, general secretary of the I. W. W., is a descendant of men who fought in the Revolution and the Civil War. The real crime of Haywood and most of the rest was the conducting of an aggressive propaganda and strike program on behalf of laborers who are interested solely in obtaining better conditions of life and labor. But that feeling has been manipulated and organized by men whose economic interests, whose right to exploit their fellows without let or hindrance, have been interfered with, and properly, by I. W. W. agitation. In so far as the I. W. W. stand as spokesmen and representatives of the most exploited class of American labor, they must be handled by men who are something more than outraged patriots, with a patriotism that coincides with a belief in their right to exploit others. No one knows to what degree they do so stand, and least of all the detectives and prosecutors of the Department of Justice. These assume too readily that they can dispose of the whole problem by putting a few men in jail.

Either President Wilson himself or the Department of Labor as his agency should be represented at the forthcoming trials, and by men who are able to distinguish between an I. W. W. injury to the national cause and an I. W. W. injury to industrial conditions that no government can afford to sanction. In the interest of safety it would be well to assume that millions of laborers are watching these cases, and that an ounce of understanding now may be worth a pound of martial law in some critical juncture of the future.

THE WORKERS ARE WATCHING.

Yes; millions of laborers are watching the cases, and millions more will be watching and awaiting the verdict. These workingmen and women, whose only crime has been in organizing the workers and striking for better conditions, must be defended. If the masters succeed in convicting our fellow workers, then the boasted right to strike will have been lost. The shackles of labor will be tightened. You will be held up to the world as men and women who deserted your champions when they needed you most. We know that you're real men and women, and we know that you're going to do all you can. But don't wait, help is needed and now. We have got to fight this case in the courts. At present we have no alternative. Send whatever funds you can to-day; organize for to-morrow. Make all checks and money orders payable to William D. Haywood, treasurer, General Defense Committee, 1001 West Madison Street, Chicago, Ill.

This is a single-tax leaflet. It is more economic serfdom. It voices the obsession of many of those whom the President has appointed to office:

DEMOCRACY V. AUTOCRACY.

Autocracy (might makes right).

All autocrats depend on "the rent of land" for their existence and power; that is why they bring on "war for land," so as to be able to "rent the land" to the people who have the same right to the land as the autocrats who rent it to them. The rent of land is the lifeblood of autocracy.

Democracy (equal rights for all, special privilege to none).

Under the single tax there would be no "war for land" nor autocrats. Why? Because the entire rent of land (instead of supporting autocrats) would be taken by taxation for all governmental expenses and returned to the people in the form of public needs and utilities, thus doing away with autocrats and "war for land."

Real peace can never come on earth while one man can charge another man "ground rent" for permission to live on the land that God or nature provided for all.

GEORGE LLOYD.

The future candidate is referred to in the Chicago Tribune of date April 19, 1918:

COAL, CARS, AND A CANDIDATE.

Dr. Garfield, although intimate with details of the coal business, is credited, by men informed as to his ideas and acts, with the belief that production is a necessary process in supplying the Nation with fuel. Production, he is said to be inclined to believe, depends upon giving the producers some reason for producing, without making that reason an unjust tax upon the consumer, but nevertheless making it a fair reason.

Until and unless the Government takes over and operates the coal mines in a national enterprise, an enterprise which it does not at present intend to undertake, the production of coal will be stimulated as the producers have reason to stimulate it.

Because the jangling authorities at Washington jangled all summer last year the Nation got its coal by the scuttle from day to day all winter and industries were suspended when they ought to have been going at top energy.

Mr. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, Director of the Railways, and a variety of less important things in the Nation's economy, is also a candidate for President. The political processes of the Nation must continue even in war time. Some one must be a candidate for President. Why not Mr. McAdoo? Mr. McAdoo himself would echo, Why not? Mr. McAdoo is a candidate.

As Secretary of the Treasury Mr. McAdoo has the big, eye-filling duty of putting over the liberty loans. In this capacity he ably directs an army of energetic orators, who penetrate every part of the country. Mr. McAdoo also penetrates. A good campaigner might not want any better opportunity of making the American man, woman, and child familiar with his name and virtues.

As Director of Railways Mr. McAdoo has another great opportunity. A record made in this accomplishment will be of inestimable value. In a fashion, it is a good thing for the country that McAdoo, in his important obligations to the Nation, has these two spurs to his energies. We do not mind that they also spur his ambitions. If Mr. McAdoo gives everything he can to his country, it would be petty to complain that he got everything he could for himself.

But a point of protest arises which is a good and pertinent point to press. In the controversy arising between Dr. Garfield, who is trying to produce coal, and Mr. McAdoo, who is trying to run the railways. Mr. McAdoo insists, and his assistants violently insist, upon a price for coal to the railroads less than the Government pays for its other needs and less than Dr. Garfield thinks will keep production going as it must go this summer.

Mr. McAdoo would have hard work defending this if Dr. Garfield can maintain his case against him. An economy for the railroads, which indirectly and unimportantly lightened the general obligation toward the guaranteed railway revenue and directly hurt the production of coal, would be a mighty costly economy. It would help Mr. McAdoo make a record in economical operation of the roads, but that record would not be fairly made and it might give the Nation another smash in the face next winter.

Dr. Garfield may not be much of a coal expert, but he is right in handling the situation from a production standpoint, and McAdoo is palpably wrong in trying to force a treatment from the railroad point of view.

We are convinced that if Mr. McAdoo were not thinking of the Presidency, Dr. Garfield would not have so much trouble with him, and we are convinced also that if there were a superior war council in Washington the difficulties the two men have with each other would not be allowed to affect the Nation.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I desire to discuss briefly the pending bill, "authorizing the President of the United States to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government." This measure is commonly known by the name of its very efficient champion in this body, Senator OVERMAN, of North Carolina, and I shall designate it hereafter as the "Overman bill."

The first section sets forth very fully the purposes of the bill, and reads as follows:

SECTION 1. That for the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, for the better utilization of resources and industries, and for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration by the President of his powers as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces the President is hereby authorized to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act, and to this end is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as he may deem necessary, which regulations and orders shall be in writing and shall be filed with the head of the department affected and constitute a public record: Provided, That this act shall remain in force during the continuance of the present war and for one year after the termination of the war by proclamation of the treaty of peace, or at such earlier time during the said year as the President may designate: Provided further, That the termination of this act shall not affect any act done or any right or obligation accruing or accrued pursuant to this act and during the time that this act is in force: Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war.

This bill is intended to give to the President power to perform any executive or administrative functions of Government through any office, bureau, department, commission, or agency now existing by law and to change from one to another as he sees fit from time to time. The authority conferred by this bill is limited to matters relating to the conduct of the present war and terminates one year after the close of the war. It is strictly a war measure and makes the President, who, under the Constitution, is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, our real Chief in everything connected with the war, not only in the departments of the Army and Navy but in every Government service in so far as its function is connected with the war, and not otherwise.

Some such reorganization of our Government for the effective prosecution of the war is absolutely necessary. Half a dozen or more departments working at cross purposes can not direct a war like this. The Overman bill, giving full power to the President, is the best way for providing that essential reconstruction and rearrangement of our complicated Government machinery.

In the exercise of those powers the President is permitted to use money only for the purposes for which Congress appropriated it, though he may change the agency which ordinarily would expend it. To illustrate:

He may direct the Navy to build ships of commerce in place of the Shipping Board, if he should conclude that the Navy is better qualified than that board to perform that very important service, or he could withdraw the functions of Director General of Railroads from Secretary McAdoo and confer them on Secretary Redfield; but he could not use any part of the one and three-quarter billions appropriated by Congress for commercial vessels to build naval vessels, nor could he use for the construction of ordinary highways the $500,000,000, or any part thereof, alloted recently to the Director General of Railroads for use in connection with rail-and-water transportation.

Moreover, the President under this act could consolidate the buying for the various scattered departments and bureaus to such extent as he may find necessary and as rapidly as conditions justify, and place this buying under the control of some central agency. Likewise, he could invest in a central agency the power to reach decisions and to determine the great questions which affect more than one department. He could remove duplication of effort where conflicting activities have developed in connection with the war. For example, he could form a central secret service for the Union by transferring to one agency the secret-service activities now scattered between many departments such as Justice, Treasury, War, Navy, and so forth.

Until some such legislation as this is passed the various bureaus and divisions of the Government will be compelled by existing statutes to continue their independent activities and there will exist nowhere the authority to bring about central control and responsibility.

Secretary Baker, in explaining a practical application of the proposed bill, was quoted by the Philadelphia Record on February 13 as saying:

We now have a cantonment division of the Quartermaster's Department in charge of temporary construction work. Suppose we desired to transfer this office to the Engineer Corps. Under existing statutes the funds appropriated for the construction work could not be transferred to the Engineer Corps. The coordination bill would make the funds more elastic and they would follow the cantonment division into the Engineer Corps. This would be true of any other funds now appropriated for specific objects.

Generally speaking, the coordination bill would enable the President to improve the war-making instrumentalities of the Government wherever he found it desirable or necessary to do so.

The Overman bill does not permit the President to do anything except in accordance with previously enacted statutes, but merely authorizes him to change existing agencies for carrying out the provisions of these statutes. Under this bill he would be obliged to confine and limit his activities to the purpose and intent of Congress in every respect except as to the selection of the particular officer or agency to execute the law. He must utilize some office, commission, bureau, or agency now existing by law and he has no power to create any new office or agency nor to abolish any existing bureau without the consent of Congress hereafter obtained.

Section 3 of the bill specifically says:

That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, any moneys heretofore and hereafter appropriated for the use of any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer shall be expended only for the purposes for which it was appropriated under the direction of such other agency as may be directed by the President hereunder to perform and execute said function.

It will be seen from this that while the President can select a different agency he can not use the money except for the purpose intended by Congress, and a careful consideration of this fact alone should convince anyone that there is not the slightest danger of "dictatorship" or misuse of power arising under this bill. The power to appropriate money—control of the purse strings—remains entirely with Congress and is not released in the slightest degree by this bill.

No business operation, no important governmental function, and especially no action of any moment connected with the prosecution of war can be carried on without money. It is an old and trite saying that "Money makes the mare go." It certainly has required vast sums of money for our participation in the war up to date, and I fear that much greater sums will be needed in the future. If anyone believes that the President will attempt to override the will of Congress or exercise powers conferred by this bill in an undue manner let him bear in mind that the whole control is retained in the hands of Congress through its power to raise revenue and make appropriations.

Mr. President, there was great criticism of the War Department and the general conduct of the war in the Senate and elsewhere about three months ago, and on the 21st of January last Senator CHAMBERLAIN, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, introduced in the Senate the "war-cabinet bill," S. 3583. This measure seemed to have the approval of several members of the Military Affairs Committee, especially Senators CHAMBERLAIN, HITCHCOCK, WEEKS, and WADSWORTH, who are among the most able and patriotic members of this body. The debate in the Senate and interviews in the press indicated that these gentlemen were thoroughly impressed with the necessity for some such legislation as was embodied in that measure.

Every other country, even autocratic Germany, has found that its governmental machinery has had to be altered, refitted, and in some respects redesigned. We have been trying to do our war work with the same machinery we had in time of peace. And it simply will not work.

In peace there are a great many unrelated things to be done, but no one thing on which the whole power of the Government must be directed. The Agricultural Department and the Shipping Board and the War Department can each do its work under a separate head without confusion. But when food has to be raised and shipped abroad for the use of our allies and our soldiers these three limbs of the Government have got to act from one common impulse, or else there is delay.

Our Government now has just one big supreme task—war. It ought to have one—not a dozen pieces—of machinery to devote to that one task.

That is what the war cabinet of the Chamberlain bill was designed to provide. That is what the Overman bill does provide.

I wish to make a comparison between this "war-cabinet bill" and the pending Overman bill. The former measure created a war cabinet, "to be composed of three distinguished citizens of demonstrated executive ability, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, through which war cabinet the President may exercise such of the powers conferred on him by the Constitution and the laws of the United States as hereinafter mentioned and described."

Section 2 of this bill reads as follows:

That said war cabinet shall have jurisdiction and authority as follows:

(a) To consider, devise, and formulate plans and policies, general and special, for the effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the existing war, and, in the manner hereinafter prescribed, to direct and procure the execution of same.

(b) To supervise, coordinate, direct, and control the functions and activities of all executive departments, officials, and agencies of the Government in so far as, in the judgment of the war cabinet, it may be necessary or advisable so to do for the effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the existing war.

(c) To consider and determine, upon its own motion or upon submission to it, subject to review by the President, all differences and questions relating to the conduct and prosecution of the war that may arise between any such departments, officials, and agencies of the Government.

(d) To require information from, and utilize the services of, any or all executive departments and executive officers or agents of the United States and of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia necessary or helpful in the proper performance of the duties of said war cabinet.

(e) In the exercise of the jurisdiction and authority hereby conferred to make, subject to review by the President, the necessary orders to any such department, bureau, official, or agency of the Government and such decisions as the matters under consideration may require or warrant.

(f) To make rules and regulations governing its own procedure; and said war cabinet shall, upon completion of its membership, immediately organize and thereupon and thereafter proceed to an expeditious disposition of all matters coming before it.

It thus appears that the war-cabinet bill proposes to create an additional agency to assist the President. The Overman bill proposes to give to the President himself the authority to exercise these same powers through existing agencies, bureaus, commissions, or officers of the Government as he sees fit. The war cabinet takes away from the President powers which the Constitution clearly intended him to exercise and confers them upon three citizens, while the Overman bill seeks merely to enlarge the ordinary powers which the Constitution contemplates shall be exercised by the President.

The war-cabinet bill creates a separate and distinct agency not now known or recognized in our system of Government—something in addition to and superior to the various Government departments and agencies, and, in a way, superior to the President himself, although the action of this board is subject to his review. The Overman bill does not create any new agency whatsoever, but merely authorizes the President to make a redistribution of functions among existing executive and administrative agencies in order to produce greater efficiency in the prosecution of the war.

However, the general objects and purposes of these two bills are the same; the ends to be attained are identical. This end, as set out in the war-cabinet bill, is the "effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the existing war," and in the Overman bill, "national security and defense, the successful prosecution of the war, the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy," and so forth. The cabinet bill provides for "supervising, coordinating, directing, and controlling the functions of all executive departments, officials, and agencies of the Government" by the war cabinet, in so far as it deems necessary "for the effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the existing war," and the Overman bill authorizes the President to redistribute functions among any executive agencies of the Government as he shall deem best fitted to carry out its purposes in the successful prosecution of the war, and so forth.

Both measures contemplate attaining the desired end in exactly the same way, to wit:

Coordinating and controlling the redistribution of the various bureaus and departments of the Government.

In the one case this is to be done by a legislative cabinet of three men—a creature of Congress, subject at any moment to be uncreated by the authority which made it. In the other case, these functions are to be performed by the President, who derives his authority under the Constitution from the sovereign people, and whose ordinary duty is to perform, to a very great extent, the very same functions enumerated in this Overman bill.

Can anyone hesitate for a moment in saying that the Overman measure is far preferable to the war cabinet bill? It seems to me that a mere statement of this question furnishes its own answer.

The reason why the Overman measure is the one to be preferred is that it really conforms to the sound principle of the concentration instead of the diffusion of power in case of emergencies requiring rapid decisions and quick action. That is a principle established on the firmest foundations by the whole experience of the human race. The Overman bill would simplify while unifying and coordinating the executive machinery; it does not thrust into the administrative system an entirely new and unprecedented body, such as the "war cabinet," which would instantly cause friction the moment it began to function. (Springfield Daily Republican, Feb. 8, 1918.)

It is one thing for Congress to create a war board either from its own membership or otherwise and attempt to endow it with any share of the powers which the Constitution vests solely in the presidential office; quite another to amplify the Executive discretion by empowering it, as would the bill of Senator OVERMAN, to reconstruct the executive branch of the Government for the period of the war, rearranging existing agencies and their functions, and establishing such new ones as he might see fit. The difference is that between a procedure unwarranted by the supreme law and distinctly ultra vires and one within the legitimate sphere of the legislative department and of unquestionable validity. The Congress can not rightfully diminish or qualify the powers which are conferred on the Executive by constitutional grant, but it can relieve that department of restrictions not imposed by that instrument, but vesting in statutory prescription or deduced from the absence of express warrant. (Virginian-Pilot and the Norfolk Landmark, Wednesday, Feb. 13, 1918.)

The President is of the opinion that he can handle the war better if granted the power conferred on him by the Overman bill. He is our Commander in Chief. We look to him for success. Therefore we should grant him all the power he desires provided same does not infringe upon the just prerogatives of Congress or violate the Constitution. The Overman bill does not take away from Congress any of its functions, nor does it violate the Constitution in any particular. The various departments, bureaus, commissions, agencies, and officers of the Government were created by act of Congress, and should it see fit to authorize the President, in his discretion, to make changes in any of these positions it has a perfect legal and constitutional right to do so. The only question for Congress to determine is whether or not it is wise to give this additional power to the President during the continuance of the awful war in which we are now engaged. In my judgment it would be very wise so to do. Not only is the President the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, and as such the one man clothed with special responsibility to lead and guide the Nation in time of war, but he is also the Executive head of the Government, and as such is specially clothed with responsibility for the faithful execution of all the laws enacted by Congress. He appoints all Cabinet officers, members of important commissions, and innumerable officials in the various branches of the Government.

The legislative department enacts laws and the executive department, with the President at its head, carries them out. It seems entirely logical and proper therefore that the Chief of the Executive Department, in the execution of the laws during a period of unusual stress and trouble, such as the present war entails, should be clothed with extraordinary power and discretion.

No one knows what needs for governmental changes will develop during the war, and for this reason we should give the President full power to meet any emergency that may arise. There has been some discussion on the floor of the Senate and, as I understand it, in committee in regard to excluding the civil departments of the Government from this measure.

It is my belief that we should take no action that in any way may hamper or delay any plan tending to the ultimate success of our Army in Europe. It may happen that some change in some branch of the Government other than the War or Navy Departments, or the Shipping Board, would in a great measure speed up the work of preparing for and maintaining that Army. Should we refuse to grant the President power to reorganize or coordinate some agency of the Government because that agency is not directly connected with the War or Navy Department, or the Shipping Board, when by so doing the usefulness of those last-named departments will be increased or their labors speeded up, we would be injuring our fighting forces. I mention no specific instance, but it is entirely within the realm of possibility that such a thing might happen. More remarkable things have happened since we entered the war. Let us be prepared for any contingency that may arise.

Mr. President, I fail to see any practical objection to the Overman bill, and can not conceive what harm may result from its passage. On the contrary, I believe that it will result in much good. The President seems to think so, and I am perfectly willing to trust to his judgment.

I do not wish to see our country injured by failure to act promptly.

Over Gallipoli England has had to write, "Too late."
Over Saloniki France has had to write, "Too late."
Over the Isonzo Italy has had to write, "Too late."

What is ahead of us this summer we do not know; but if we fail now to make a radical reorganization of our Government for war purposes, we may find that those words "Too late" will have to be inscribed by America over some ghastly defeat, where but for our failure, perhaps in this very instance, there might have been written "Victory." Why should we take the chance? It would be folly to do so.

As was so well said by Mr. Odell, in the Outlook of February 20 last:

No President could have had more thorough and devoted allegiance than that accorded to Mr. Wilson by the people of the United States. To a very marked degree political partisanship, sectarian difference, regional strife, and industrial feuds have all been sunk in a splendid display of loyalty. But the people were and are loyal to Woodrow Wilson because he is the symbol of the principles upon which the Republic rests and the ideals toward which it strives. The loyalty is to the man who fills the Executive office and who exercises the function of interpreter of those principles and ideals. The people feel that everything of value in their material, social, moral, and spiritual life is summarized in him. And that loyalty is universal.

Mr. President, I know full well that if serious failure comes from any executive or administrative branch of our Government, the natural tendency will be to hold President Wilson more or less responsible therefor, since he is the executive head, and as we are holding him responsible we ought in justice and fair play to give him a free hand in the management of the Nation's business. I for one have full confidence that the President will perform every duty imposed on him by the pending bill with high credit to himself and great benefit to the public weal. He certainly has done well thus far, and has handled many difficult situations with wonderful tact and ability. The American people as a whole have absolute trust in our President, and Congress, which reflects the will of the people, should voice that trust by promptly passing the Overman bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the greater part of the debate on this bill, and such parts of it as I have not heard I have taken pains to read carefully in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It has been a very interesting and a very able debate.

The speech of the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who always speaks with great force and power, was particularly delightful; and yet at the same time I believe that his conclusions on the constitutional questions involved were wholly erroneous.

Take the speech of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]—and there is no more gifted man in this body than that distinguished gentleman—in favor of a part of the bill, as I understand, and very much opposed to other parts. I think for once he has allowed his great fear of what might be done to overcome his usually excellent judgment. I do not agree with him that we are giving too large powers to the Executive in this bill. I do not agree with him that we are giving him unusual powers in this bill. As I listened to him, just as I listened to the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] this afternoon, I could but wish that the wonderful power, the great ability, the driving force of each one of these two great men were behind this bill and behind that for which it stands, rather than opposed to it, and opposed to that centralization of Executive authority, at this time so necessary.

Mr. President, I also listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], who says that there is no use in passing this bill, because the President already has the powers that are conveyed to him in it. I readily concede that the Executive already has a great many of the powers that are enumerated in this bill, but he has not all of them; and the question is, Is it wise at this time to give them to him?

The distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], who has charge of the bill and has managed it so well up to date, of course is strongly in favor of it; but he says that we ought to give these powers to the President because of the President being Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the country. I agree with the Senator in his conclusions about the wisdom and necessity of the bill, but I differ from him in his argument. I think that this bill has only an incidental effect upon the powers of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. I do not think the powers sought to be given in the bill relate to the President as Commander in Chief, but only to the President as Executive.

And then comes the argument of our very delightful and attractive friend from Illinois, the junior Senator from that State [Mr. LEWIS], always eloquent, always interesting, always uniquely brilliant, right in his conclusion, but, in my judgment, wholly in error in his method of getting there. He says, virtually, that the bill is unconstitutional, but that unconstitutionality makes no difference, because all of the Constitution is virtually in a state of suspense during a war, and we need not pay any attention to it. Well, of course, I wholly differ with him on that subject. I think the bill is constitutional, and that it is our duty to make all our acts conform to that instrument. I think that instrument is good in both war and peace.

What are the questions that are before us in this bill? The opponents of the bill say that it is wholly unnecessary. That is the first question—that it is not necessary to give the President these powers, that he either already has them or he ought not to have them if he has not. The second proposition is that it is unconstitutional. I want to discuss those two questions very briefly in their order.

Now, as to the necessity of it, if Senators will follow me just a moment, I will read from the bill itself just what it proposes to do. In the first section the material and contested part of it is that—

> The President is hereby authorized to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act, and to this end is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as he may deem necessary.

There are two provisos limiting the time of the act to the war and the authority of the act to be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war.

Section 2 provides:

> That in carrying out the purposes of this act the President is authorized to utilize, coordinate, or consolidate any executive or administrative commissions, bureaus, agencies, offices, or officers now existing by law, to transfer any duties or powers from one existing department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer to another, to transfer the personnel thereof or any part of it, either by detail or assignment, together with the whole or any part of the records and public property belonging thereto.

Section 4 provides that if the President concludes that any department or bureau should be eliminated entirely or abolished he shall report his conclusions to Congress.

The second section is similar to the first, except it goes a little further and authorizes him to utilize, coordinate, and consolidate any executive or administrative commissions, bureaus, and the like. Those are the material sections of the bill. Are they necessary or are they unnecessary? Are the opponents of the bill right when they say there is no use in them? Let us see if there is any use in them.

Certain opponents of the bill on the floor a few days ago challenged those who believe in this bill to give any reasons why it should be passed, any necessity for it, as I understood them. Mr. President, I happen to be a member of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, and this whole subject arose out of an examination that was begun before that committee at the opening of this Congress in December. From the evidence that was brought before us it was clearly apparent that a more complicated system of executive machinery could hardly be imagined than that which confronted us by the evidence of the witnesses produced there. Especially was this true in the War Department. After a careful examination that committee concluded that something should be done. At first a munitions bill was reported out for the purpose of doing what? Of doing precisely what this bill does—of centralizing the purchasing activities of the Government in a munitions director. Then another bill was suggested, known as the war-cabinet bill, which granted to the Executive far greater power to make changes than this bill grants to him. The committee thought those measures were right as centralizing measures, as measures to give force to the executive branch of the Government, to give a centralizing energy to it, so that we might accomplish those things which the necessities of the country require in this war. The whole country demanded the centralization of executive power, the newspapers everywhere approved the idea, the civic writers all over the country approved a centralized system.

Then the President did not feel that the plans of the Military Affairs Committee was the right way to go about it. He felt, according to the published statements, that it was conferring too much power on the three appointees provided for in the bill and was an invasion of Executive function. He said that he would not approve the measure, in substance, and after that statement was made every man with even a modicum of brains knew that no bill would be passed affecting the Executive power unless such bill received Executive sanction. The President evidently believed, and I am frank to say that I have not discussed it with him, but evidently he believed that there was something necessary to be done, just as our committee believed, just as the newspapers of the country believed, just as all intelligent men of the country believed, that some additional centralizing force and power should be given to the executive branch of the Government.

Thereupon this bill, known as the Overman bill, was introduced for what purpose? For the purpose of doing precisely the same thing, for effecting exactly the same purposes, for performing exactly the same functions that these other bills which had been proposed were for.

For the life of me, Senators, I can not see how any Senator who was in favor of either of those bills can be opposed to this bill, because it does not go as far as the bills proposed by the Military Affairs Committee. I thought those bills were in the right direction and would have been glad to have voted for them; and so I think this bill is in the right direction and that we ought to vote for it, and we ought to enact it into law as soon as possible.

I want to give you the practical reasons for my position. If Senators will bear with me a little while, I am going to give concrete illustrations of what can be done under this bill, so that the executive service may be benefited. It is not a question of politics; it is a question of opinion; it is a question of fact. I have what I conceive to be a number of facts upon which this bill can be maintained and on account of which it should be immediately passed.

Through a long term of years there has grown up in all the departments a complicated system commonly known as red tape. We talk about red tape in the Army and Navy. There is just as much red tape in the various executive departments to-day as there is in the Army and Navy. It is all one when it comes to that. Everybody understands it. There is not a Senator who goes to a department who does not understand it fully. No one, unless we are experts or have been here half our lives, can go at once to the department and reach the right officer the first time, unless he finds it out beforehand by extensive telephoning, and it is very difficult to find out beforehand. All of us, no doubt, are met frequently with the proposition, when a constituent comes here wanting to go to see the proper officer about a matter of business, that we are unable at first blush to carry him there. We may have to go to half a dozen different departments before we find the man he wants to talk to. Why is that? It is simply because of a lack of centralized effort, of executive or department or bureau efficiency, and that is what this bill is intended to bring about.

But I promised concrete reasons.

Take the Bureau of Foreign Trade Advisors and the Bureau of Commercial Treaties, both of them in the State Department, separate bureaus in the State Department, and the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in the Department of Commerce. Will any Senator say that those bureaus ought not to be consolidated? Can any Senator say what reason there is for having a Foreign Trade Bureau in the State Department and a bureau of commercial treaties in the State Department and a Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in the Commerce Department, all separate agencies of the Government? No wonder that Senators are in doubt when they have a question like that arising from one of their constituents as to where he should go.

That is the first one. We will take the second, which has already been discussed—the auditors of the various departments. I am not going into that, because it was fully discussed here the other day. They ought to be centralized; they ought to be consolidated. We ought to have efficient service where we have inefficient service now, and we all know it.

The Bureau of Printing and Engraving is in the Treasury Department, and the Public Printing Office is a wholly separate bureau or department of its own. Is there any logical reason that any Senator can claim for not having those consolidated?

Senators stood here the other day opposed to this bill and asked that concrete examples be pointed out for the necessity of the bill. Will Senators conclude that these three are not concrete examples? And these are but the beginning.

The Bureau of Public Health. Where would you expect to find it? It is in the Treasury Department! They have here a Bureau of Public Health, or what means the same thing, in the War Department and another bureau, performing exactly the same functions, in the Navy Department. Is it possible that Senators should know about those departments, affecting the public health, of which you never hear now? Why? Because they are diffused, because their energies are not properly correlated. They ought to be consolidated, made efficient, and they can be if authority is given the Executive in this bill to do so.

We come next to the Supervising Architect's Office. A stranger to our institutions would never guess where it is. It is in the Treasury Department. He is not the architect of our money, but he is supposed to be the architect of our buildings. It certainly is an illogical place for that to be, and so illogical that when our military operations were begun and when our naval operations were increased at the beginning of the war what happened? We have an architect's bureau in both departments. The Architect Bureau of the Treasury Department was swept aside and a new one substituted, a new one in the War Department, and, I believe, a new one in the Navy Department; and, by the way, I want to say, without the fear of successful contradiction, either, that there is no department in the Government that needs executive attention more than these building departments. Do you know under whom all the cantonments of the country have been built? Is it under officers of the law? These cantonments were begun and perhaps continued ever since to be built by that nondescript body known as the Council of National Defense under a plus-cost contract run by dollar-a-year patriots. A more expensive system, a system more open to suspicion could not be devised. Mr. President, if there was no other reason for the passage of the bill, it would be to give the President the right to correct the building operations of the Government. No bureaus in our entire system have been more prolific of waste, extravagance, and perhaps worse, than this building system now in force.

I next come to a general supply committee, and there is one in each one of the 10 departments. Is it a wonder that the Government has to pay the very highest price for everything it buys? Look at the list and you will see why that is so. There is one supply committee competing with another. Is it any wonder that the Government has to pay the highest price for all it buys under such a system of purchases and supplies as we have? These supply systems should be centralized and consolidated.

Then we come to a question I have no doubt is in the minds of most of the American people to-day in a peculiar way. Why is it that we can not catch and punish the so-called German spies? That thought seems to be uppermost in the minds of most of my constituents. I get more letters about it, possibly, than on any other subject of public importance. Why is it? The answer is simple. The laws as they are now provide for a secret-service bureau in the State Department, another secret-service bureau in the War Department, another secret-service bureau in the Navy Department, another secret-service bureau in the Post Office Department, and a fifth secret-service system in the Department of Justice. There are at least five secret-service systems, wholly independent one of the other. Is it any wonder that we are not making any progress in our spy system? Congress has met the demand that has been made upon it and has passed the most stringent spy legislation; but what has been the result?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator might well add the Secret Service in the Treasury Department.

Mr. McKELLAR. I intended to. If I did not, I just casually overlooked it. Of course, we have one there. We have six different, independent, stupendous systems of secret service, and as one man wrote me, a few days ago, that with all those systems you are not catching many German spies. I do not know how true that is, but it seems to me we ought to put the secret-service system of this country under one control, under a centralized control of a strong and virile man who knows how to manage that particular business so that the work of the Government may be properly done. If we had a centralized, vigorous, well-administered secret-service system under one head, we would take care of our traitors and spies expeditiously. They could and would be promptly found out and arrested, quickly tried before constitutional courts, and effectually punished. It would end all this agitation in favor of military tribunals dealing with this species of crime. We must deal out punishment for these crimes quickly and effectually, and we can only do it by a centralized and vigorous system of secret service. Let us not lose our heads. Let us follow constitutional methods. That constitutes seven reasons why this bill ought to be immediately passed.

I next come to the Army for just a moment. In the Army we have an Army Medical Museum and Library, and an Army medical school, and the office of the attending surgeon, whatever that is—I do not know. We have three different supply bureaus already, and in the Navy we have a Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, a Navy medical school, a Navy hospital, and a board for the examination of medical officers, and a Navy dispensary, and a board of medical examiners. There are 8 or 10 different boards in those two departments. Is it possible that these do not constitute alone a reason why we should have centralized effort and centralized energy in the conduct of the war?

Now we come to the Bureau of Navigation in the Commerce Department and a Bureau of Navigation in the Navy Department. Why have both? There is some little reason for it, which I shall not go into, but it could be managed a thousandfold better if the two were consolidated.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McKELLAR. I would prefer if the Senator would just make a memorandum and call my attention to it a little later. I do not object to answering his question, but I will be glad if he will just retain it for a few moments until I get through with what I want to say on this particular subject.

We have a United States Shipping Board and an Emergency Fleet Corporation. Is there any Senator here who would like to keep them separate any longer? We have had them separate for quite a while. We have not many ships. We have been greatly disappointed because ships have not been built as fast as they might have been built. We did go as far as to make the same man an executive officer of both not long ago. Does any Senator want to keep them apart by law? Is it not the view of every Senator here that these two boards ought to be consolidated, and especially now since they have put a real skilled man at the head of it, and I mean no reflection at all upon the splendid men who have heretofore managed and controlled those corporations? They were bound down by shackles of law and of many untoward circumstances; and they could not do any better, bound down as they were. I think every Senator here will agree with me that there ought to be a consolidation here of these two bureaus.

Again, some years ago, in a law that was passed, I believe, about two years ago, it was thought wise for the Executive to take over the railroads of the country in certain war contingencies. If this Overman bill had been the law, all he would have had to have done was to have selected the best man for that particular work. Under the law as it was, hampered by legal interference with Executive powers, the President had to go to the Secretary of War and get his consent to transfer the powers to Mr. McAdoo, whom he desired to appoint to take over the railroads and who was peculiarly fitted for that particular office. Acting under this bill, the President would have had a right to have appointed Mr. McAdoo directly; and that is the kind of authority he ought to have during this war. If we want the best executive service, we ought to give him not legislative power—I am just as much against giving the President legislative power as is any other Senator—but what I contend for is that we ought to give him executive power; we ought to allow him to run his department of the Government in his own way, unhampered by legal red tape, and to hold him responsible for it. We should give him full power over all his executive bureaus. That is reasonable; that is what our Constitution says we ought to do. I am not contending that we ought to give powers of legislation to the President; oh, no; but I say again—and I hope I can put it into the minds of Senators—that we ought to give him the right to manage his own executive office in a way that will be best for the country. I am not, however, through with concrete examples.

Here is the whole Council of National Defense. I hardly know what to say when I come to discuss that useless body, but I think I ought to be very careful in what I say. It is a useless body, taken as a whole, with its commissions and its committees and its advisory commissions and its advisory committees, amounting to several thousand men. Why, we ought to give the President the right to abolish the whole business, and select such of the men as are doing good service, giving them honest pay for their services, and retaining them in their proper positions in the Government. The policy of this Government accepting the gratuitous services of its citizens is all wrong; and, when we come to think about it, there is always a doubt whether or not those services are really gratuitous. We know they are not in all cases. The President ought to be given the power to weed them out, taking those that are all right and honest and straight, men who are helpful to the Government, giving them places under the Government, and making them stand solely for the Government. Those who are profiteering should be stricken from the rolls of Government service in disgrace forever.

Then I come, in the next place, to the "dollar-a-year men." They are just a part of the system. The President ought to be given the power to abolish these "dollar-a-year men." The whole country has decided, by common consent, that they ought to have been abolished long ago. I do not mean by that that all men who serve the Government at a dollar a year are incompetent or improperly here; many of them are amongst the most patriotic citizens we have; but the President ought to be given the power to select those who are all right, and to put them to work at a fair and proper salary for the Government alone, they not to have any other interests but the Government's.

Then I come to the advisory commissions. We all know that those ought to be dismissed. I am merely saying what I would do if I were there and what you would do if you were there. You would dismiss them, taking the very best of them and putting them to work for the Government at a proper salary such as they ought to have. This is what I hope the President will do.

Again, I come to the most important of all of them. Some Senator challenged, I think, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] the other day to give a concrete example why the passage of this bill was necessary. I have mentioned 17 or 18 already, and really those are merely a start; I am not going into all of them; I have merely selected a few; but there are hundreds of others which the President will no doubt weed out, if we pass this bill, to the great benefit of the Government and to the great benefit of the American people in this time of war.

Mr. President, we come next to the Supply Division of the Army and the Navy. What do we find? We find, under the system that was in vogue until a short time ago, five of the great departments of the Army were competitive purchasing agencies. We had a purchasing agency for the Ordnance Department; we find another for The Adjutant General's Department; we had another for the Signal Corps; we had another for the Medical Corps; we had still another for the Quartermaster Corps; every one of them competing each with the other for those things that are absolutely necessary in supplying our Army—competing over clothes; competing over uniforms; competing over shoes; competing over steel. All of the products of this country were included in one or the other of them, and there was competition of the largest and most active kind. There is not any possible excuse for that.

Those are not all of them. When you come to enumerate those five you will find that they were competing with the Navy Department as to practically everything. Is it any wonder that the Government has had to pay enormous prices under a system like that? Is it any wonder that we fail to get clothes and uniforms for our boys on time? Is it any wonder that we failed to get guns and ammunition on time under such a system of purchase and supply? Senators, we ought to rectify it at the earliest possible moment. I have often thought, after having examined into both systems—this system of the War Department and its diffusion of purchases under five great heads, all competing with one another, and then the whole system competing with the Navy, and then seeing how splendidly the purchases of the Navy Department have been managed under one head—I have often thought it would be a splendid thing if the President had this power and would appoint a man like Admiral McGowan, who has shown such remarkable skill and ability in the management of his office, to take charge of it and buy the supplies for the whole service.

Why, Senators, from a careful examination of the prices which have been paid, of the system that has been used up to date, I will say that I believe that if we had an organized, centralized, coordinated, purchasing system for our Army and Navy we could and would save this Government $1,000,000,000 a year every year during this war. I see members of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate here in the Chamber, and I desire to say that I believe that they will all agree that this statement is substantially correct, that if we had a centralized, organized, system of purchasing supplies, with an honest, energetic, forceful, capable, and determined man at the head of it, if no advisory committees and no dollar-a-year men were connected with the system, we could save this Government $1,000,000,000 a year. With these facts before us, which are admitted by everybody who knows, can Senators say that there are no concrete examples showing a necessity for the passage of this bill? I can not believe it.

Some Senators say it is a bill giving the President too much power. My answer to that is that it is all executive power, we are not giving him legislative power. It is all power connected with his administration of his own office, which department is coordinate with ours.

Mr. President, here are some 19 concrete illustrations of how this power can be used for the benefit of the American people to-day. I should like Senators to read them in the RECORD to-morrow, and see if they do not commend themselves to them as reasons why this bill should be passed.

I do not know how the President is going to use these powers, but I know I would use the powers along that kind of lines if I occupied that position and other Senators would most likely do the same thing under like circumstances, and so I imagine the President is going to act along such lines, generally speaking, though I have not talked with him on the subject, and I do not know. However, he will have the power to do so; we shall have put the responsibility and the burden on him, and under the laws and Constitution of the United States it belongs to him.

Mr. President, it is said that this bill is radical; that it is revolutionary; that it goes too far in conferring unusual powers on the Executive. Well, there are a great many Senators in this body who were in favor of both the munitions-ministry bill and the war-cabinet bill. I felt, too, that something along that line ought to be done, as my colleagues on the committee know. The war-cabinet bill, as was so splendidly pointed out yesterday by the distinguished and able senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], goes much further in the powers it confers upon the Executive than does this bill. It creates new offices and new centralized authority, whereas this bill merely permits the President to coordinate and consolidate offices already established. The speech of Senator SHIELDS is a classic on the legal aspects of this bill. It should be carefully weighed by any Senator who is in doubt. Senator SHIELDS is one of the ablest lawyers in the Senate, and his speech on the legal and constitutional aspects of this bill is a valuable contribution to this debate.

If Senators will bear with me just a little longer, I want to point out this remarkable fact, that as far back as 1853 the Congress recognized that reorganizations in the executive departments ought to be had. What did they do then? They passed a law giving the heads of the departments the power from time to time to alter and distribute among the various bureaus and offices of the departments the various functions performed in those departments. Is it possible that we have come to a point where we will say by our legislation that we are willing to give the power to alter and consolidate bureaus, divisions, commissions, and the like, to the various heads of the departments, who are nothing but the arms of the President, and decline to give equal power to the President himself to make such consolidations; and that, too, in time of war? It seems to me that, whatever may have been the powers given to the heads of the departments heretofore, now that we are engaged in war we ought to give them to the one strong, vigorous, virile head of the whole Government, who is carrying on the war and who is responsible under the law and to the people for the conduct of all the departments as well as responsible for the whole conduct of the war.

More than that, I see Senators before me this afternoon who voted to give the President power similar to this, although probably it did not go quite so far as this. I did not have the honor of being a Member of this body at the time, but I voted for the bill in the other House. On March 3, 1917, this law was passed:

> The Bureau of Efficiency shall investigate duplication of service in the various executive departments of the Government, including bureaus and divisions, and make a report to the President, who is hereby authorized, after such reports shall have been made to him, wherever he finds such duplication to exist, to abolish the same.

In other words, Mr. President, we find that the Congress itself has passed a measure not as full and as ample as the proposed law, but along exactly the same lines and having the same purposes. The Congress first gave the authority to the heads of the departments which, if not exercised properly, they then turned it over to the President. The only trouble is that they did not go far enough. Those were times of peace. Surely, if such laws as have just been discussed were proper in times of peace, now when we are in the greatest war that the world has ever known the President ought to have the right to organize the several executive departments as he sees fit.

It has never been objected that the Congress had no right to confer upon the heads of the departments the right to redistribute the agencies within such departments. Surely, if Congress has the power to delegate this power to the heads of departments, it also has the right to delegate it to the President, who is the real executive head of the department.

It was in the power of the President to change his Cabinet at will, and also the power conferred upon the executive department, as set out in these statutes, that no doubt gave to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] the view that the President already had all these powers now.

There is no doubt in my mind that the President has many of the powers now, but certainly there is no real reason why he should not have the authority asked for in this bill.

The provision which I have quoted is along the same line as the pending bill, and I have mentioned it for the purpose of showing that this bill is not revolutionary; that it is not unusual; but it is in conformity with past acts in our legislative history since the year 1853 until March 3, 1917. In other words, we find the Congress itself, even as late as March, 1917, giving the President these powers. I have already referred to the war-cabinet bill, which goes much further than this bill, and I shall not refer to it again.

Mr. President, the investigations of the Committee on Military Affairs were the real beginning of this legislation. It was those investigations which showed the reason, the need, and the necessity for the pending legislation. Can any Senator, after knowing that these conditions exist, these complicated conditions, these rival bureaus doing the same work, these duplications of services, these useless offices, contend that there should not be some reorganization and redistribution of executive functions? They not only cost the Government a great deal, but they are clogging the machinery of the Government at this time when we ought to be energetic and effective. We can not be energetic so long as power is diffused over so much territory and in so many hands as it is to-day.

Mr. President, I think that disposes of the question of the necessity for passing this bill. Mind you, all the committees that have handled the matter have reported that some action is necessary. I doubt if there is any Senator on this floor who does not think that some action looking to the reorganization of the executive departments is necessary. The President himself says it is necessary. President Taft said it was necessary many years ago, even in times of peace. The newspapers of the country say it is necessary. The whole people feel that there ought to be greater energy and greater centralization of power and action in the executive branch of the Government, so that our country may proceed on its way to victory over Germany.

Then, if the necessity exists, we next come to the question of whether we can do it under the Constitution. Senators have argued very ably that this bill is unconstitutional. Before going into the constitutional branch of the subject, I wish to take a moment or two to discuss the executive side of this controversy.

We are all reasonably familiar with the Constitution. In order to find out whether the measure is unusual, whether it is revolutionary, let us go back to the history of the Executive for a few moments. I will only suggest these matters to Senators, for they have all read the books concerning these questions and probably are more familiar with them than I am; but it must be remembered that under the confederation we had no executive; the various States were the executive power. Then came the formation of the Constitution, and one of the greatest debates that took place in the Constitutional Convention was over the question as to whether we should have a council as executive or whether we should have an individual executive. We had just been at war with England, where the executive power was reposed in a crowned head, a king, and where they had an executive council. The American people and the American Constitutional Convention, which established the Constitution, as representatives of the people, were jealous of both. Such men as Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, and Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, ably and earnestly argued that the executive power ought not to be put in the hands of an individual, that it ought to be in a council of not less than three; but James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, made the fight for one individual executive and finally won. What were the powers that were given? I am referring to this for the purpose of showing how necessary it was in the minds of the framers of this great instrument that the Executive should have proper and competent powers.

Mr. President, right here let me say that I am not going to read the provisions of the Constitution that give executive powers, but I ask unanimous consent that they may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> ART. II, SEC. 2. The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States; he may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices, and he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.
> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.
> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.
> ART. II, SEC. 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in case of disagreement between them with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper; he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers; he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. The President also was required to take the following oath:

> I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States and will to the best of my ability preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States.

I want to call the particular attention of the Senate to a quotation from the Federalist, this particular article being written by Mr. Hamilton:

> There is an idea, which is not without its defects, that a vigorous executive is inconsistent with the genius of republican government. The enlightened well-wishers of this species of government must at least hope that the supposition is destitute of foundation, since they can never admit its truth without at the same time admitting the condemnation of their own principles. Energy in the executive is a leading character in the definition of good government. It is essential to the protection of the community against foreign tax; it is not less essential to the steady administration of the laws, to the protection of property against those regal and high-handed combinations which sometimes interrupt the ordinary course of justice, to the security of liberty against the enterprise and assaults of ambition, of faction, and of anarchy.

* * * * * * *

Taking it for granted, therefore, that all men of sense will agree in the necessity of an energetic executive, it will only remain to set out the ingredients which constitute this energy. How far can they be combined with those other ingredients which constitute safety in the republican sense, and how far does this combination characterize the plan which has been reported by the convention?

Here is the meat of the statement:

The ingredients which constitute energy in the Executive are: First, unity; secondly, duration; thirdly, an adequate provision for its support; and fourthly, competent powers.

Let us apply that to the situation as it is to-day. We have the individual as President. We have a proper duration of the office for the conduct of the war, nearly three years more of this term. Congress has given the Executive unlimited means. The only other question is, Has he the competent power? He says he has not; and all those who are familiar with conditions here know that he has not the competent powers to manage his executive end of the war in the best possible way for the good of the country at this time.

Now, why should we not give it to him? Are we jealous of him? Oh, no, I can not believe that any Senator would feel that way. Are we afraid? I can not understand that. Why should we be? We have checks and balances on him. If he were to misuse the powers—and, of course, no one believes he will do that—Congress always has the power to call a halt to it. Why should we not give him the competent powers? Do we not all want him to accomplish the same purpose? We want him to win this war. Why should he not have the competent powers?

I say that we should give them to him. This bill would give them to him, and when we give them to him we are putting the burden of their proper exercise on him under the law and the Constitution. He is the man who controls this situation as Executive; and, mind you, I am talking about the President as Executive only. I do not think this bill applies at all, except in an inferential way or in a remote degree, to his office as Commander in Chief. We can not interfere with his powers as Commander in Chief in the field of the Army and the Navy. What we might say would not make any difference in his exercise of those powers. I am talking about his executive powers, and we ought to give him competent powers to carry out the functions of his office as Executive in the time of a great war.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. How can Congress give to the President executive powers? The Constitution vests all the executive powers of the Government in the President, and I do not see how we can either enlarge or diminish his executive powers.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad the Senator has asked that question. I will say to the Senator that he will find that through a long system of legislation Congress constantly has given to bureaus and departments and divisions of Government portions of the executive power, and this bill is intended to unshackle or to take away from those underofficers the power that Congress has heretofore given to them—of course, with the consent of the President. They are really executive powers that have been conferred upon some individual or some bureau in some department, and this bill merely proposes to hand them back to the Executive. In that connection, I want to call the attention of the Senate to this fact: We have been heretofore legislating by giving authority to the various departments of the Government. We have 10 executive departments. Under the theory of our Constitution, of course, these 10 executive departments are but 10 arms of the President. They are part of the executive function. They are part of the executive office. It is true that we have given many of them other powers, some legislative powers, some almost judicial powers, and some executive powers. I have looked into the question of the President's Cabinet. It is not, strictly speaking, a constitutional body. It is referred to in the Constitution in two different places, but it is not, strictly speaking, a consitutional body by express provision.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will excuse me for just a minute, I will yield in a moment. I have found this remarkable thing, or what appears to me to be this remarkable situation: The Secretary of State is not required by statute to be confirmed by the Senate. The Secretary of War is in the same condition. The Secretary of the Treasury is in the same condition. The Attorney General is in the same condition. The Secretary of the Navy is in the same condition. Each office was created by a separate act of Congress, and nothing is said in any of them about confirmation by the Senate. Later on, when other departments were founded, Congress did provide that the newly made heads of them should be confirmed, and I think a reasonable interpretation of the Constitution requires that all of them should be confirmed, since their offices are not inferior offices in any way within the meaning of the Constitution, although the Secretary of State in the beginning was but a clerk to the President. The duties of the Secretary of State are specifically placed by the express terms of the Constitution upon the President himself.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator from Tennessee help the Senate by attempting to define what executive power is?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been very, very much interested in that question, and I find that the line of demarcation between what is executive power and what is legislative power and what is judicial power under our Constitution is so vague and indefinite in many cases that it is almost impossible for any man to tell what it is. I imagine that with the great constitutional learning and the great ability of my very able friend from Iowa he probably can give the Senate a better definition of what is executive power than I can give. But I find that the courts have held that these Cabinet officers and these departments are nothing in the world but branches of the Executive office; that the President is responsible for all the acts of all of the 10 Secretaries and of all the 10 departments. Since the Senator has asked me that question, I have the opinion of the court right here, and I call the Senator's particular attention to it.

It will be seen that the only reference to executive departments is that the President would have a right to call on them for an opinion in writing in reference to matters relating to the duties of their respective offices. In other words, it is perfectly apparent that the framers of the Constitution intended that the President, with the limitations mentioned in the Constitution, should be the executive authority, and that this authority was not to be divided up with a council or Cabinet or with any of the members thereof. This view is upheld by the courts. In the case of Wilcox v. Jackson (13 Pet., 498) it was held:

[This case involved the taking of certain land and the occupying of same through the orders of the Secretary of War, and the court held, among other things, as follows:]

"Now, although the immediate agent in requiring this reservation was the Secretary of War, yet we feel justified in presuming that it was done by the approbation and direction of the President. The President speaks and acts through the heads of the several departments in relation to subjects which appertain to their respective duties. Both military posts and Indian affairs, including agencies, belong to the War Department. Hence we consider the act of the War Department in requiring this reservation to be made as being in legal contemplation the act of the President, and consequently that the reservation thus made was in legal effect a reservation made by order of the President within the terms of the act of Congress."

Again, in United States v. Eliason (16 Pet., 291) it was held:

The power of the Executive to establish rules and regulations for the Government of the Army is undoubted. The very appeal made by the defendant to the fourteenth section of the sixty-seventh article of the Army Regulations is a recognition of this right. The power to establish implies, necessarily, the power to modify or repeal or to create anew. The Secretary of War is the regular constitutional organ of the President for the administration of the Military Establishment of the Nation; and rules and orders publicly promulgated through him must be received as the acts of the Executive, and as such be binding upon all within the sphere of his legal and constitutional authority.

There is no doubt that the various departments and the various Cabinet officers are not independent executive agencies, but they are all executive agencies under the President. That question has been settled by the court and was settled by the Congress itself, if it could do so, away back yonder in 1836. The Senator from Iowa will find, by an examination of the history of the Cabinet and the decisions had about it, that the Secretary of the Treasury is the only Cabinet officer who is required to report to Congress. Of course there was a reason for that. He had to do with the revenue, and only Congress had to do with the revenue, and he was required to report to Congress. So when the great fight came on, some time between 1830 and 1840, between President Andrew Jackson and those who wanted to maintain the United States Bank, it was actually argued that the Secretary of the Treasury was not an executive officer at all; that he was a legislative officer, an officer of the Congress; and I believe a bill was introduced to provide for the dismissal of the then Secretary and the appointment of a Secretary of the Treasury by the Congress. Of course, however, that bill was not passed. All the courts have held that each of the executive departments is merely an arm of the Executive, and the Executive is responsible for all their acts, and when the departments within their several authorities do an act it is in law and in fact the act of the President of the United States, of the Executive.

Now, the trouble is—and I address myself particularly to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], in whose address I was greatly interested the other day, and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], too, whose wonderful ability was so aptly shown in the address that he made on that occasion——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator from Tennessee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Tennessee need not spend any time in attempting to convince me that the members of the Cabinet are executive officers. I have no doubt about it. I am sure that they are.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, as I understand the Senator, he is of the opinion that these various powers, such as are put in this bill, and such as were given the President under the act of 1917, are executive powers. The Senator was a Member of the Senate at that time, and the RECORD does not show that he voted against it. That act gave the President directly similar powers to those given to him under this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, possibly I ought to qualify that statement a little. I think that a great many of the duties of the Department of Justice are not executive in their character; but I can not now think of any exceptions so far as other Cabinet departments are concerned.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think if the Senator will reexamine the history of the Department of Justice—I know he has examined it time and again before—he probably will change his mind on that subject, for this reason: The original act of 1789, which is supposed to have constituted the Department of Justice, did not constitute the Department of Justice at all. It just created the office of Attorney General, and provided for his appointment. He was then an advisor of the President. It was supposed at that time that he was largely a personal advisor. Of course the country then was very small in comparison with what it is now, and a situation existed that was quite different from the present one; but the Department of Justice, as such, was not even established until 1870.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, I understand that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Originally the Attorney General was an advisor of the President, and some people even doubted whether his place was entitled to be called a Cabinet office or not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it makes any difference whether one of the departments is known to the Constitution or created by law, or how it sprang into existence; I think the principle would remain just the same. But the Senator from Tennessee certainly would not insist that when the Attorney General files a bill in equity in behalf of the United States for relief to which he thinks the country is entitled he is performing an executive act; or that when he makes an argument before the Supreme Court of the United States in litigation pending he is performing an executive act; or when he files an information upon which some one charged with crime can be brought to justice—I am sure the Senator from Tennessee will not claim that any of these things constitutes an executive act.

Mr. McKELLAR. At first blush, I will say to the Senator, I am inclined to think they do. The line of demarcation is hazy; I will grant the Senator that; but I am inclined to think that when the Attorney General files a bill on behalf of the United States under a legislative act directing somebody to execute it, and that is the mode pointed out by the statute of executing it, he is doing an executive act, and that is part of the executive branch of the service. That is just my notion, offhand. I have not had my attention called to it previously, nor have I ever examined the authorities on the question.

Mr. President, the next question—and I shall take only a short time longer—is this: Is this bill constitutional? I want to say that if I believed that this bill was not constitutional I would never vote for it. I believe that the Constitution of the United States is supreme. I believe that when I took an oath to support the Constitution that oath meant something real, something concrete. I would not vote for a measure that I believed was unconstitutional. If any Senator believes that this bill is unconstitutional he ought not to vote for it. I can not better illustrate my views about the Constitution during this time of war than by reading a very short excerpt from a very great lawyer and judge, and he was speaking for a very great court, the Supreme Court of the United States. It is a case that has been referred to frequently. It is a short excerpt that I want to read, and it is a case that has been referred to recently on this floor.

I can not do better than to spend a minute and a half or two minutes in reading this statement to the Senate again. Mr. Justice Davis, in the Milligan case, in Fourth Wallace, said:

> Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint, and seem by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper, and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence (pp. 120–121).

I read this because it is appropriate to more than one bill. It is appropriate to this bill. It is a direct answer, as I conceive it, to the argument of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who has argued that the Constitution is, or many provisions of it are, suspended in time of war. I do not believe in any such doctrine. If I believed that this law was unconstitutional, I would not vote for it. The court continues to say, very briefly:

> The power to make the necessary laws is in Congress; the power to execute in the President. Both powers imply many subordinate and auxiliary powers. Each includes all authorities essential to its due exercise. But neither can the President, in war more than in peace, intrude upon the proper authority of Congress, nor Congress upon the proper authority of the President. Both are servants of the people, whose will is expressed in the fundamental law (p. 139).

Mr. President, we hear much about an invasion of the rights and functions of the legislative branch by the executive branch of this Government. We hear much about how sometimes one and then another Executive has undertaken to invade the jurisdiction and assume the functions of the legislative branch. Did it ever occur to Senators that we frequently invade the jurisdiction and may sometimes assume the functions of the Executive? We have done it time and again, in establishing these various bureaus and divisions in the departments. We have separated them when they ought not to be separated. We have put limitations on Executive functions when we ought not to have done it. Among a hundred different bureaus, divisions, and departments by a course of legislation of over a hundred years, we have, unwittingly perhaps, but nevertheless done it just the same, diffused the Executive powers into the hands of others. We have established a bureaucratic form of government, contrary to the purpose and intent of the Constitution, as I believe. This bill simply provides that the Executive shall exercise his proper functions, and I say to Senators at this time of the greatest crisis we have ever had in our country, if there ever was a time when we needed a strong Executive with ample power to carry out the plans that we formulate for him, now is the time. We have the strong Executive. We need only to give him the power. I ask Senators, not upon the mistaken view that this bill is unconstitutional, for it is not, not to withhold from the Executive those powers that will permit him to conduct his office as we expect him to conduct it. There have been many shortcomings in various executive branches. Let there be no excuse for it in the future. Put the power where it belongs. We can not run this war. The law confers that duty upon the executive branch of the Government. Do not let us hamper him. I am not speaking for the President. I am speaking for the country. I am speaking for the Constitution. I am speaking for the democracy of the fathers. The laws and the people have given him the place. Let us give him the power to give the place energy and vigor and efficiency and push, so that we may win this war. There is but one question before the American people to-day and that is how we may best and quickest lick the Germans.

Mr. President, I come to the next question. Senators say, "Oh, well; the bill is unconstitutional." Why? Because it gives legislative power, they say.

I have heretofore set forth the material provisions of this bill. What power is granted the President under it? Substantially it is to prescribe rules and regulations by which he can conduct his own department of the Government. He is the Executive of the Government. The members of his Cabinet are merely his 10 executive arms. The departments presided over by these cabinets are merely the instrumentalities through which he executes his office. As was said by Judge Davis in the Milligan case, the power to make the necessary laws is in Congress, but the power to execute is in the President. Both powers imply many subordinate and auxiliary powers. Each includes all authorities essential to its new exercise.

As I have always understood it, the executive branch of the Government is a coordinate branch of the Government, but learned Senators are speaking of the powers given in this bill, not as Executive powers but as some unusual powers that the Congress is conferring upon the President. As I look at it, it is merely putting him in a position so that he can execute the duties of his own office.

Surely he should be allowed to say how he desires to arrange the executive instrumentalities that the Congress has arranged for him. As a matter of fact laws that the Congress has heretofore passed have very greatly restricted the President and the administrative service, as I have heretofore argued. These laws, of course, bind the administrative officials in the discharge of their duties, and as we all know the Constitution entered into a great deal of detail and has imposed very great limitations upon the powers of the Executive and those immediately under him.

This bill, in its last analysis, simply gives the Executive the right to establish rules and regulations under which the executive departments of the Government must be centralized, coordinated, and made effective in this war. That this bill is constitutional there can be no doubt upon an examination of the authorities.

Of course, it is conceded that Congress must delegate legislative power to the President. Our Supreme Court in the case of Field v. Clark (143 U. S., 692) has directly passed upon the question. In that case, as Senators recall, the Congress by what is known as the tariff act of October 1, 1890, placed rates of import duty upon a vast number of articles.

Section 3 of the act provided that in order to secure reciprocal trade with countries producing sugar and other articles the President, whenever he should be satisfied that the government of any country producing said articles imposed duties on the same that were unequal and unreasonable, should have the power to suspend by proclamation the provision of the act. This provision of the tariff act was attacked on the grounds that it delegated the power to the President to legislate and the power to declare an act void in part.

Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the majority of the court, held, after going over all the cases, that the act was constitutional. In that act the President was given the right to suspend the law whenever he need; that is, whenever he found that the duties were unequal and unreasonable, to suspend the law. The cases are directly in point, for under this bill the President is during the period of this war given the right to suspend. The provisions are various acts regulating the executive department whenever he deemed necessary, or, as construed by the Supreme Court, whenever after examination he should find that a redistribution or consolidation or transfer of duties would be beneficial to the officer of his department.

The Field case is much stronger than the case presented in this bill, because the act in the Field case had to do with purely a legislative function, while the proposed act in this case has to do solely and alone with executive functions, concerning which there is doubt in the minds of many as to whether the President may not have the right to make the regulations anyhow. Certainly he has the right to make them under his general executive authority and under statutes already in existence.

It has been held—

> The regulations prescribed by the President and by the heads of departments under authority granted by Congress may be regulations prescribed by law, so as lawfully to support acts done under them and in accordance with them, and may thus have in a proper sense the force of law, but it does not follow that a thing required by them is a thing so required by law as to make the neglect to do the thing a criminal offense in a citizen where a statute does not distinctly make the neglect in question a criminal offense. (144 U. S., p. 688.)

The case of Interstate Commerce Commission against the Railroad Company (167 U. S., 493) is illuminating. Mr. Justice Brewer delivered the opinion of the court. The question was whether the Congress had, under the interstate commerce act, conferred upon the commission the legislative power of prescribing rates, either maximum or minimum or absolute. In that case it is indeed held as follows:

First, that Congress might itself have prescribed the rates, or, second, it might have committed the same to some subordinate tribunal to perform this duty. Apparently, according to this holding, Congress has the right to delegate to a subordinate body the right to legislate. I quote from the opinion of the court, on page 494, as follows:

> Before the passage of the act it was generally believed that there were great abuses in railroad management and railroad transportation, and the grave question which Congress had to consider was how those abuses should be corrected and what control should be taken of the business of such corporations. The present inquiry is limited to the question as to what it determined should be done with reference to the matter of rates. There were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for consideration. Congress might itself prescribe the rates, or it might commit to some subordinate tribunal this duty, or it might leave with the companies the right to fix rates, subject to regulations and restrictions, as well as to that rule which is as old as the existence of common carriers, to wit, that rates must be reasonable. There is nothing in the act fixing rates. Congress did not attempt to exercise that power, and if we examine the legislative and public history of the day it is apparent that there was no serious thought of doing so (p. 494).

A very similar situation exists in reference to this bill. For some time it has been believed that great abuses have existed in the effective administration of the War Department and other departments; that too much red tape exists; that there are too many officers and employees engaged in different bureaus in doing the same thing; that there is no coordination of work; that there is no coordination of duty; that each department has many separate bureaus and divisions acting separately; and that large amounts of work are being duplicated. It is believed that because of the war innumerable other commissions and bureaus and boards and officials and committees, advisory and otherwise, have grown up, and all of these separate and independent organizations have led to disorganization and to lack of efficient administration.

One of the great questions before Congress and before the American people for the last several months has been the question of how to locate these abuses. The Military Committee suggested one method; the distinguished Senator from Iowa suggested another method. The President of the United States has suggested the method contained in this bill. There can be no doubt that Congress has the authority to adopt any method that it sees fit. The bill requires the President to publish these regulations, and when they are published they have all the force and effect of law.

Are these cases in point? In this bill we are giving the President the power to suspend certain of the operations of various acts creating various branches in the executive departments.

Mr. President, these cases are sufficient. There are many others which can be cited. If the powers conferred in this bill are mere Executive powers, and he already has them, as argued by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, it could be no injury to give them again. I agree with that able Senator; he already possesses many of them.

I next come to the proposition submitted by my friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. He says just excuse the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Reserve Board and there will be no trouble about it, and that he will vote for the bill.

Mr. President, all of us have heard of shutting the stable door after the horse has been stolen. To excuse the Interstate Commerce Commission at this time would be a repetition of that act. We have already given the President greater control over the Interstate Commerce Commission than this bill gives by an act that is already the law and for which all Senators here voted, as I recall. Certainly they did not vote against it. We have already given the President greater authority over the Interstate Commerce Commission than this bill gives him.

I want to read just an excerpt from that law. It does provide that the Interstate Commerce Commission can pass upon the questions that it has been in the habit of passing upon as before, but at the same time it adds this apparently innocent-looking proviso:

> Provided, however, That when the President shall find and certify to the Interstate Commerce Commission that in order to defray the expenses of Federal control and operation fairly chargeable to railway operating expenses, and also to pay railway tax accruals other than war taxes, net rents for joint facilities and equipment, and compensation to the carriers, operating as a unit, it is necessary to increase the railway operating revenues the Interstate Commerce Commission in determining the justness and reasonableness of any rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice shall take into consideration said finding and certificate by the President, together with such recommendations as he may make.

We waste our time in wondering whether or not we are giving any peculiar or unusual powers to the President over the Interstate Commerce Commission after the enactment of such a law, practically by the unanimous consent of this body. It seems to me, we are talking about something, with all due respect to the distinguished Senator from Georgia, whom I admire very greatly, that question is behind us. We have already given the Executive the power over the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Senator from Georgia says that we must not assume that the Interstate Commerce Commission will not do its full duty. I agree with the Senator about that, but I say that that commission will not rise above the President; it will not make its opinions regardless of him in view of the law as we have already made it. If they do they are going directly in the teeth of this statute that we have already enacted, because we have commanded them, we have directed them, we have enjoined upon them, that they must consider what the President says about these rates, in rendering their decision, and there is no answer to that proposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator claim that considering a question requires that it should be accepted as conclusive, without regard to other testimony? Is that the Senator's position?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; that is not my position. I will say to the Senator that I think, under the particular wording of this statute, and knowing what the Senator believes about it and what the Senator said the other day about it, I am sure he is in a very doubtful state of mind and probably would not have voted for that bill if the full force of it had been brought to him before he voted for it. The act says the commission must take into consideration said finding of the President and certificate by the President. Not only the finding but the certificate; that these are necessary, together with such recommendations of the President. First, in other words, whatever facts the President gives them they must take into consideration, then the certificate made by the President, and then finally they have got to take into consideration the recommendation given them by the President. It is an absolute case.

I am not a prophet nor the son of a prophet, but I venture the prediction right here and now that it makes no matter what President ever makes that finding and that certificate and that recommendation to any Interstate Commerce Commission in accordance with that proviso, that finding, that certificate, and that recommendation of the President are going to be the last word, and the commission will uphold it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very glad to hear the Senator from Tennessee denounce the recent railroad law in that respect; that is, he inferentially denounces it, and there is a good deal of weight in what he says. What I desire to ask him now is this: Does the Senator think——

Mr. McKELLAR. Before the Senator asks his question, I want to say that I do not want to be put in the attitude of denouncing a law after voting for it. I do not think anyone should be put in that attitude. I merely say whatever may be the merits of that provision of the railroad law, it removes any objection to voting for this bill because of any interference with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not vote for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. The RECORD does not show that anyone voted against it, as I explained in the beginning. There was no yea-and-nay vote. I, of course, can not say how the Senator voted. Since his statement I am sure he did not vote for it, but evidently he did oppose it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe in it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure the Senator does not.

Mr. CUMMINS. I made the objection then that I am making now. Although I do not agree with the Senator's interpretation of the law, I think there is still something left that the Interstate Commerce Commission can do for the protection of the people. But that is not what I rose to say. I rose to ask the Senator from Tennessee whether, in his opinion, we have also given to the President the power to make a valuation of the railroad property of the United States. You remember——

Mr. McKELLAR. I recall it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Some four years ago we charged the Interstate Commerce Commission with that duty. It has gone forward and expended a good many million dollars on that undertaking. Does the Senator think that the law we passed a short while ago took that power or duty away from the Interstate Commerce Commission and gave it to the President?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not sure about that. I doubt if it did; but, on the other hand, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; you may.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a question bearing on the same proposition. Could the Senator say whether he believes that the valuation of the railroads is such a subject as can be held to be connected with the war under the terms of the provisions of the Overman bill? I have my very grave doubts about it, I will say to the Senator. I do not think that function of the Interstate Commerce Commission could be disturbed under this bill. It has nothing to do with the war.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I were administering the law, I might have some doubt of it; but, guided by what has been said here and what is thought elsewhere, I am quite clear that the President might reach the conclusion that it had some relation to the war. I may say, further, it is one of the duties which, in my opinion, is still left with the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. The valuation of the railroads?

Mr. CUMMINS. The valuation of the railroads.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think the proposed statute that we are discussing now, known as the Overman bill, affects in the slightest or remotest degree that question. I do not think the President has any right to consolidate or rearrange any office except those that pertain to this war, and for the life of me I can not see how the independent function of valuing the railroads can be regarded as a war activity. It may be, but I do not believe it. I would not construe it that way if I were doing the construing. For that reason I think it is immaterial whether that particular question arises in this case or not.

Mr. CUMMINS. That question, after all, will have to be decided by the President, from which there would be no review or appeal.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not so sure about that. I think any invasion of the right would be subject to review.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does not the Senator recognize the fact that the certificate of the President has reference to the total problem of income, and in no way affects the distribution of rates, with reference to discriminatory rates or with reference as to commodities or as to localities? That all bears simply upon the total amount that must be raised, and in no way affects the important question of discrimination.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I do not think it has any such limitations as he suggests should be put upon it. I think this provision is full, ample, and complete, and that it gives the President the right; if he is not satisfied with a rate that is fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, all he has to do to correct it and to have it fixed according to what he believes it should be fixed is to make this finding, this certificate, this recommendation to that effect, and that the Interstate Commerce Commission must give effect to his recommendation. In my judgment this provision of the statute either has this meaning or no meaning at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator think that the certificate is to follow their decision or to be before them at the time they make their decision? Does it not plainly say that, in making the decision they are authorized to render, this certificate shall be before them and be considered in connection with other evidence in reaching their decision?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am inclined to think possibly that the Senator is correct in that conclusion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me call the Senator's attention, furthermore, to this language, because I know the Senator means to be fair:

> That when the President shall find and certify to the Interstate Commerce Commission that in order to defray the expenses of Federal control and operation fairly chargeable to railway operating expenses, * * * it is necessary to increase the railway operating revenues—

That is, his certificate that it is necessary to increase the revenues—

> the Interstate Commerce Commission in determining the justness and reasonableness of any rate, fare, charge, classification, regulation, or practice shall take into consideration said finding and certificate by the President.

Therefore, is it not clear that the extent of the function of this certificate is to give information to the commission as to the necessity for a certain amount of revenue, leaving for their determination the whole problem with this information given by the President, and does not touch the question of discriminatory rates at all?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, without this proviso, under the peculiar conditions that we have in this country about the railroads, the President could have sent in a statement, and it would have been evidence in any case without any statutory provision. He would have been a proper witness. There was no reason why he could not. The Congress, however, has done something more than making him a witness; it has said that, under the circumstances enumerated in the statute, while he is in possession of the railroads he must make a finding first; then he must make a certificate, second; and, third, he must make a recommendation. Then they tell the body that is to give its final construction that they must consider it and take it into consideration. In my judgment, it means they must accept his view and decision. It virtually gives him the right of an appellate court.

Now, as to the refinements of logic or the refinements of legal interpretation, the Senator from Georgia may be correct and I may be wrong; but I say, so far as practical results are concerned, whenever the President of the United States—it does not make any difference who he is—makes that kind of a certificate to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the commission is going to leave that rate just exactly as the President says for them to leave it, or fix it as he recommends that it shall be fixed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to give him a concrete proposition?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose there was an increase of rates; and without any change of classification certain existing rates were placed upon coal in east Tennessee, and protest was made against the discriminatory character of those rates. The protestant could show that the practical effect of the discrimination stopped the moving of that commodity and discriminated against that locality in favor of Birmingham; that they could be given fair rates, and still the revenue raised by the Government from the railroads would be just the same as the amount which the President said was needed, would the certificate of the President in any way affect the right of the parties aggrieved in east Tennessee to demand from the Interstate Commerce Commission a revision of the rates upon the ground that the rates put on them were discriminatory?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so; but looked at from a practical standpoint, I think the Senator will agree with me that whenever my constituents in Tennessee or his constituents in Georgia come to Washington to complain of the rates since the passage of this other bill, they are going to the executive department of the Government first and are not going to the Interstate Commerce Commission. They are not going to spend much time with the Interstate Commerce Commission, because it is perfectly apparent to everybody who knows how these things are managed practically, that the real power is already lodged by the railroad act with the Executive; that it is already taken away from the Interstate Commerce Commission and is in the hands of the Executive, and that we need not bother about it in this bill. That is my idea in reference to the matter.

Mr. President, I desire to say, in concluding these remarks, that I have been very greatly interested ever since this Congress began in having centralized, vigorous, energetic Executive action. We need it to win this war. All the experts testified before our committee that we needed it—Mr. Baruch, Mr. Catchings, Mr. Coffin, Mr. Gifford, Mr. Willard. Our country is now in the greatest crisis it ever was in; it is confronted by conditions that require our most serious attention and our best endeavors, and we are giving that serious attention, in my judgment. We need action, we need it more than we need anything else in the world to-day; and the action we need is efficient Executive action, unhampered by bureaucratic organizations and red tape.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator from Georgia will excuse me a moment.

Under the hampering acts not of this Congress, but of past Congresses, diffusing all the Executive functions among so many bodies, the Executive to-day finds himself in a position where, if he has a good man in the Department of Commerce, say, where he is not needed, and has a place in the War Department where he is needed above all things, he can not transfer that man from one department to the other, because Congress has by law said he can not do it. This bill will give him that right.

Now, I want to say, in all fairness, we are all striving for the same thing. We want to whip Germany; we can only do it by unhampered Executive action. Let us all get behind the Executive and give him the right kind of help; give him Executive power and hold him responsible for it, and we shall win. Let us help him with our every effort and with our every influence.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia, before he interrupts me, that it is a pity that an executive department could not have the benefit of his great driving personal force, could have the backing of his vigorous personality, and of the personality of men like him in this great conflict. We need strong men like the Senator from Georgia in all departments. But we need also the talents and strength of the Senator from Georgia behind them.

Let us stop quibbling about terms; let us see whether these acts are constitutional; we ought to see that; but let us quit quibbling about whether or not we are giving the President an inch too much authority or taking away a little bit of authority from some one else. Let us get behind the Executive, win this war, and work out all these academic questions afterwards. That, in my judgment, is what we should do. Let us give the President this power and pass this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I was going to yield the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question; but first I wish to express my most intense agreement with the Senator's statement that strong men should be put in the War Department and force be given to the work everywhere. I desire to ask the Senator this question: Has there been anything, except the failure to select him, which is preventing a strong man from having charge of the construction of our flying machines? Did it need any law like this 10 months ago to put a capable man in charge of that work to drive it forward?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I will add one other question and then sit down. Has there been anything to prevent the selection of a strong man as Chief of Staff and putting him in office and keeping him there, and also a Chief of the Quartermaster Department, and a Chief of Ordnance, and keeping them on the job and strengthening their organization?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I had intended to close when I uttered the last sentence; but the two questions the Senator has put to me are entirely proper at this time, and I will take pleasure in answering them to the best of my ability. The Senator asks about aircraft production. I am not going into the aircraft question further than to say that everybody knows that is a new art; at best no one knows a great deal about it. There have been mistakes committed in carrying the work forward; we all know that; we know from our examination that a great many mistakes have been made; they have not done what we expected; they have fallen far short of what the country expected; they have not lived up to the promises made; all that is true; and we can not deny it; but we do not know, in the very new state of that particular aircraft art, whether others could have done better. Perhaps they could; perhaps they could not; perhaps there ought to have been changes, and I believe, if we give the President this power, he will make the necessary changes.

I suggested to the Senator from Georgia the other day when he was passing a great encomium, and I think a well-deserved encomium, on the recent appointment of Mr. Schwab as head of the Shipping Board, that I thought that that was all right; Mr. Schwab is my kind of a man at a time like this. I think we need a man to drive, to force, to do, to execute; and I think Mr. Schwab is one of that kind of men, but I will ask the Senator suppose after a short time——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It did not require this legislation to appoint Mr. Schwab, did it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I know it did not; but it will require this legislation to do with Mr. Schwab what perhaps it might be wise to do with him. Suppose after two or three months Mr. Schwab has thoroughly mastered the shipping business and they are turning out ships at the proper rate; that we are exceeding our expectations under the management and control of a man like that; but there is still lagging and delay in regard to aircraft production. I hope devoutly there will not be. Suppose others have in the meantime been appointed to head the Aircraft Production Board, but that no substantial progress has been made. We know there have been several changes in the Shipping Board, and there may be several changes before we can get action in the Aircraft Production Board. Suppose, however, Mr. Schwab makes a great success of the Shipping Board, and it is believed that he will make the same kind of a success in organizing the Aircraft Board, and after getting the work of the Shipping Board well under way, if Mr. Schwab is peculiarly the man to fill the aircraft bill and to give us airships, why should not the President have the right to appoint him?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I answer the Senator that the President certainly could do that without any bill at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have very grave doubt as to whether Mr. Schwab could hold both places.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Neither of them is an office, but each is a place of responsibility in connection with construction work.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the President's action would be disputed at once; no doubt many Senators would say that the President was transcending his powers if he undertook to consolidate offices of that kind.

Will the Senator repeat the second question asked me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. How many matters has the Secretary of the Treasury charge of?

Mr. McKELLAR. He has charge of two, and the action of the President in those matters has been ratified by the Congress; the Executive had to come before Congress and get his action ratified; and Secretary McAdoo is filling both positions excellently well. I could not wish for our Government anything better than that all of its departments were filled in the same splendid way that Secretary McAdoo is filling both of his.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to say that he does the work splendidly.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was the second question?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Georgia asked in regard to the Chief of Staff.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not know that I am capable of judging about the capabilities of the Chief of Staff. It has been a long time since I was a military man. I myself have felt that we made some mistakes along that line; I am frank to say that some of the appointments that have been made did not meet my approval, but that is one of the reasons for the passage of this bill. If the Senator will examine our military history and our military laws and regulations, he will find that the Executive is confronted by red tape in the appointment of all of our officers, and when the Executive goes against a rule laid down by the military authorities he puts himself at variance with them. He ought not to be left in that position. Give him the powers that are conferred by this bill, and we put it upon him to make the selections and make him responsible for them. I venture the prediction now that whenever we turn these powers over to him we shall see the greatest improvement in our strictly military program, just as we will see the greatest improvement in our executive program.

Mr. President, I believe that we ought not to haggle any further; I believe that we ought to pass this bill, give the President the powers, and hold him responsible for the execution of those powers. The Executive has shown no disposition to be a usurper or dictator thus far. Only yesterday, in his letter on martial law, he has given additional proof of his being an intense believer in constitutional government. He surely does not believe in the rule of the military; nor has he done anything that is silly. Suggestions that he is ambitious to overturn departments, strike down useful commissions, and do away with democratic institutions are wholly unwarranted by the history and the character of the present Executive. He will utilize the powers given him in this bill better to protect and defend this Government and not to injure or destroy it.

Mr. WOLCOTT obtained the floor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator has taken the floor to make a speech.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to address the Senate on the pending bill. I have no desire, however, to go on to-night if the Senator wishes to make a motion.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator is willing to go on in the morning, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WOLCOTT. My desire in getting the floor was to put myself in the position of being entitled to the floor when the bill comes before the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then I move that the Senate——

Mr. STERLING. Will not the Senator from North Carolina withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. OVERMAN. I withhold the motion.

Mr. STERLING. I offer an amendment to the pending bill in the nature of a substitute, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 24, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 23, 1918.

Father in heaven, humbly and reverently we bow in Thy presence and acknowledge with gratitude our indebtedness to Thee for all that we are and all we hope to be.

Pour down upon us Thy spiritual gifts and grant us every blessing which shall purify, ennoble, exalt; that with true devotion to Thee and our fellow men we may fulfill every duty devolving upon us, in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a reply by my colleague, Mr. LUFKIN, to letters urging Congress to hurry up.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Alabama rise?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the basis of his privilege.

Mr. HEFLIN. On April 5, Mr. Speaker, I made a speech in this House replying to a speech made by Representative MASON, of Illinois, in February. On Saturday, during my absence, when I was down in Greensboro, N. C., making a speech in the interest of the liberty loan, the gentleman from Illinois made a speech attacking me personally, and that speech was published in the Birmingham Age-Herald, wired by somebody from here, and that newspaper stated that the Republican membership of the House, supplemented by a few Democrats, ordered it sent down; and in that speech, which was published in full in the Birmingham Age-Herald, the gentleman from Illinois reflected upon me personally, upon my patriotism, courage, and integrity, and he stated, among other things, that I had the most patriotic mouth and the most cowardly legs [laughter and applause on the Republican side] of anybody, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. Is that all the basis?

Mr. HEFLIN. No, sir. In another place in that speech he misrepresented me by saying that I stated in response to a question of Representative BURNETT, of Alabama, prior to that time, that I was willing to sacrifice my sister's son but was not willing to go to war myself. In another place he insinuated that I was fond of getting up here and insulting every man in the House who had feelings. Mr. Speaker, I have quite a number of these privileged matters marked, but these, I think, are sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think there is some basis for the personal privilege in the speech, but very narrow, though.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the American Congress, as a Member of this House I took an oath to support the Constitution and to bear true allegiance to the United States Government, to protect it against all enemies, both foreign and domestic. All that I have done and said since we entered the war has been in response to my duty under the oath that I took. It has long been the boast of the German Government that in every war she has waged she has had men in positions of trust in the enemy's country where they could serve her most effectively. In this country she has sought to place them in the War and Navy Departments and in Congress, so as to keep in touch with the war program and to have bills introduced and speeches made that will embarrass this Government and furnish German propaganda to the spy system, to be published and franked over the country at the expense of the United States Government. Since Germany made war upon the United States things have been done and said in both branches of the American Congress that have given aid and comfort to the enemy. Things have been done and said by Members of Congress that have greatly embarrassed the President and seriously hindered the Government in the mighty work of war preparations, and these things have injured our country and helped the enemy.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not think it is the province of this side to protect the time of the House, but for future precedents I wish merely to make the suggestion, and then I shall leave it to those who have the responsible charge of the House to protect the time; but thus far what the gentleman has said, it seems to me, is not at all in order under the claim he has made of personal privilege.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I want to be heard on that for a moment. The gentleman from Illinois impugned the motive that prompted me to speak against him here on April the 5th. So far as I am concerned, there is nothing personal in my feelings in this matter. If I know my own heart, I am trying to perform my patriotic duty while our boys are fighting and dying over yonder. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend for a minute. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts make the point of order?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes, sir; I make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. Now I will hear the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order is not well taken. I am laying a predicate for the speech I am going to make, showing that things have been done and said on this floor that have not been helpful but hurtful to the country, and I am leading up now to what I propose to say upon that subject, and I trust that no gentleman on that side will undertake to disturb me. I want to make this speech in my own way. And I stand ready to take the responsibility for it in any form that gentlemen may desire.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman wishes to ask unanimous consent to address the House, and that side of the Chamber thinks it important enough to give the time of the House to it, I for one shall not object. I simply thought I would call attention to the point of order for the sake of precedent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that these questions of personal privilege ought to be confined to privileged matters. If we did not do that, we would have a row here nearly every day. The remarks the gentleman has been making are not pertinent to the question of privilege. It is a very good speech and perhaps somebody ought to make it. Maybe he ought. But you can not discuss this whole war and outside things to a question of privilege. Now, if the gentleman desires to ask unanimous consent to proceed with his speech——

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not want to take up unnecessarily the time in the House, Mr. Speaker, but I have been assaulted by the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] for doing what I thought was my patriotic duty.

The SPEAKER. I know; but here is the trouble about that: This matter the gentleman has been stating is not pertinent to this, to what he claims is an unfair commentary of the gentleman from Illinois, made in his former speech. And the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] is that if the gentleman from Alabama wants to ask unanimous consent he will not object.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I have no objections to that. Perhaps it is not necessary even to make the inquiry, but it seems to me that by this a very dangerous precedent is likely to be established if this continues as a matter of personal privilege. My inquiry is this: Has a Member on the question of personal privilege entitling him to the floor the right to answer remarks submitted by a Member in the course of debate on the floor?

Mr. HEFLIN. Published in a newspaper outside.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. It does not matter where it was published.

The SPEAKER. Of course——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Let me suggest, if I may, to the Chair that my understanding of the situation is this: The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] made the speech alluded to. There is not the slightest doubt in the world but that he said things in that speech which, if they had been called to the attention of the Chair at the time, the Chair would have said were out of order. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] must recognize that.

Now, admitting that they were improper remarks, as they were under the rules of the House, and to which the gentleman could have called attention and offered objection had he been here, or some one for him if he was not here—now, can he, under the guise of personal privilege, claim the floor for an hour to make another speech?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state this, that the way to get at improper remarks is to have them taken down, and then proceed to whatever the House wants to do with them. The House was in the Committee of the Whole at the time, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] was not here, and nobody did that. Now, that does not prevent him from rising to a question of personal privilege on remarks that were made that reflect on his character or his reputation or his career in any shape, form, or fashion. It would be sufficient if it were printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but particularly so when it has been printed in a part of the public press. But the gentleman must adhere to the orderly procedure. Now he asks unanimous consent to proceed for 40 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I have no desire to increase the personalities that may grow out of this controversy, I wish to say that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] has no special grievance in this particular case, since he was the aggressor. I say that with all respect to him. He made a speech reflecting upon Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. Now, the Chair does not want to waste time here to-day by going into the history of this transaction which is very unpleasant from beginning to end, on both sides.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has asked for unanimous consent, and I am trying to reach the point where he may have unanimous consent, so far as I am concerned. The gentleman has been persistent in making speeches reflecting upon his colleagues in the House.

The SPEAKER. That raises an entirely different question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the Chair permit me to make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to know whether, if we permit the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] to proceed to a renewal of his attack, which, of course, may provoke an answer from some one, and he transgresses the rule as to personal reference to Members of the House, may he be called down?

The SPEAKER. He may; yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, I want to give notice to the gentleman, for whom I entertain a warm regard personally, that I will watch his speech carefully.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then, I wish the gentleman would allow me to proceed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I object. I do not believe——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects, and that is the end of that.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. I rise to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama may proceed for 39 minutes.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama may proceed for 39 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SNYDER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects, and that is the end of it. The Chair never did say anything about the point of order raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, but he sustains it and rules that the speech so far as it has gone has nothing to do with the question of personal privilege.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, in the speech made by the gentleman from Illinois during my absence he says:

> Cheap peanut politics. He assaults me because I am a Republican, and he hopes to make in his district some little cheap capital from the fact that he has been able to assault and insult me.

That is the substance of his statement.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there was no occasion for me to undertake to play politics in that speech. I was not playing politics at all. I do not have to play politics. I have no opposition in my district, and have not had any opposition but once in 14 years. I was not undertaking to make political capital by doing things that were unpleasant to me, and they are unpleasant, gentlemen of the House. I would rather make people laugh than to offend them. But I have registered a vow, and I here renew it, that so long as this war continues and our boys are fighting and dying on the battle front in France, I propose, if I can, to close up the ranks in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not proceeding with the discussion of his question of personal privilege. There are other Members of this House who are as patriotic and as anxious to defend the boys at the front as he, and some at a greater sacrifice. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not proceeding in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ALEXANDER). The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman's point is well taken, so far as the gentleman from Alabama has proceeded. The Chair has been called to the chair just recently and has not given attention to the entire speech. The gentleman should address himself to those questions which he claims are the basis of his question.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Chair did not hear this proposition, then, where he accused me of playing cheap politics by assaulting and attacking him, and I am telling the House why I made my speech. Otherwise, if I can not do that, we have no rule by which a Member can protect himself from such assaults in this House. I submit to the Chair that under that statement, "cheap peanut politics" and that I assailed him because he is a Republican, that I should be allowed to state why I did reply to his speech. I am not assailing him because he is a Republican. There are some as brave and patriotic Republicans on that side as there are brave and patriotic Democrats on this side. I have commended the course of men on both sides, but because I see fit to reply to a Member's speech that he makes upon the floor of this House, I hold, Mr. Speaker, and I believe the Speaker will hold, since the matter is laid before him, that I am proceeding in the line of privilege provided for in the rules. I am not attacking the gentleman from Illinois for political purposes. No; gentlemen. Nothing is further than that from my mind, although one paper in my State has played up his speech, published it in full, and attacking me—a strange thing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did not the same paper play up the gentleman's speech and play it up most eloquently?

Mr. HEFLIN. It did not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit me, I will produce from my office in five minutes a report of the gentleman's speech attacking the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] published in the same paper as the speech of Mr. MASON.

Mr. HEFLIN. The notice about my speech was very short—about as long as your finger.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; in which some adulatory terms were used. And it referred to the fact that the gentleman from Tennessee came down from the chair to the gentleman from Alabama and personally congratulated him upon his eloquence. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. That is true. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that it is a game that the gentleman has played equally with the other gentleman whom he attacks?

Mr. HEFLIN. No. That was just a little notice away back in the paper, while this other story commenced on the front page. [Laughter.] Yes; this other story commenced on the front page, and the headlines read this way:

When the cats are away the mice will play with Mr. HEFLIN.

[Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true. If the gentleman had obtained those headlines, would he be here this morning asking for leave to speak on a question of personal privilege?

Mr. HEFLIN. That is not the question. They were not there. [Laughter.]

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I can not yield.

Mr. MEEKER. I want to know if that refers to the two-minute speech.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. VENABLE. Does the gentleman object?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Alabama object? The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will, if it does not take me off the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama must decide for himself whether he yields.

Mr. HEFLIN. If it does not take me off the floor I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I can not do it unless the Chair will say that it does not take me off my feet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes with the understanding that the gentleman from Alabama shall not lose his right to the floor. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will let me proceed in my own way. His last speech, which is now the basis for this personal privilege matter, and which attacks me for replying to his other speech, was made during my absence. I was not here to answer the gentleman or to interrupt him. He was told by my good friend from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] that I was down in North Carolina making a patriotic speech, and then it was that he said that I had a brave mouth, but cowardly legs, and I submit that I am here now, and my legs are standing by me pretty well. Now, I would like to proceed in my own way.

I was about to speak of the Age-Herald when my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] interrupted me. It published the speech of Mr. MASON, of Illinois, in full; a strange procedure, gentlemen. [Laughter.] I have not yet been able to quite understand just what part the Age-Herald has in this matter, and just who inspired the Age-Herald to do it, and I am still wondering just who in Alabama furnished the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] with the Age-Herald editorial that he read from in his attack upon me. A strange situation, gentlemen, a long-distance secretive connection between some sort of Democratic politics in Alabama and an Illinois Republican. [Laughter.] Is not that a strange combination, a curious thing? And I am not deceived about the matter. I shall probably have more to say about it at another time and place. I know what is back of it. But this speech that was sent down there said that the Republican membership ordered the clerk to send it prepaid. Why, I thought of a great many patriots on that side, like the gentleman from Illinois sitting in front here, Mr. MCKENZIE; Mr. FOSS, Mr. HAMILTON, and a great many others of you over there, and I said, "I do not see how gentlemen could——

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend a moment. The gentleman can not wander out of the limits and talk about anybody else, except what Mr. MASON says.

Mr. HEFLIN. I was just discussing the Age-Herald and——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands; but the gentleman named certain Members of the House who are sitting in their seats quietly and not bothering him.

Mr. HEFLIN. That was complimentary, and if the gentleman from St. Louis wants me to stop that, then I will quit complimenting my good Republican friends. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To make the point of order, in all kindness and charity, that the gentleman from Alabama is not proceeding in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just sustained the point of order made by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The point is broader than that. The gentleman is talking now, if he has any right to do so at all, on a matter of personal privilege, and he has made no reference to a personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr Speaker——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I make the point of order that he is not addressing himself to the question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. That point has just been settled.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Affirmatively?

The SPEAKER. Affirmatively. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] said in that speech, which was published in the Birmingham Age-Herald—I am still working on that—that I assailed and insulted him for the purpose of benefiting me politically. I disclaim any such intention as that. That was not my purpose, and in this connection I was just simply undertaking to state what the Age-Herald said about how it got the Mason speech. I am trying to show what motive was back of that part of it, aside from the part that the gentleman from Illinois has played.

The next statement was to the effect that the gentleman himself sent it, and said, "I made the following speech to-day," and his name was signed. Then comes the New York Evening Sun and says that Mr. BRITTEN, of Illinois, wired it and paid for it and that the Age-Herald used it, and wanted to pay him back the telegraph toll that he had paid. I am trying to make plain the connecting link in this transaction. It is this long-distance arrangement, extending from way down there somewhere in Alabama to way up in Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Is it not true that the gentleman from Alabama forwarded his speech, marked it "Collect," and that it was returned, and that the gentleman paid for it? That is true, is it not?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do. What was the gentleman's question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that in some instance the gentleman from Alabama forwarded a speech to the same paper?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The gentleman from Alabama has no right to yield the floor for an inquiry which is outside of the question of privilege that he is attempting to discuss.

The SPEAKER. That point of order is sustained.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the Chair will permit me to answer that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend and give the Speaker a chance. The question that the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked would lead to another excursion into the realms of recent history. It is out of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman asked me if I did not send a speech, myself, collect to the Age-Herald.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has just ruled that the gentleman's answer and the question are both out of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. But the Age-Herald editorial, charging that I did, is in the RECORD, and I want to answer it. I did not send collect that speech, as the Age-Herald said that I did.

The SPEAKER. That is a sufficient answer to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not fair that the gentleman should have an opportunity to answer that question?

The SPEAKER. Why, no; it has nothing on earth to do with this.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from North Carolina rise?

Mr. POU. One of the charges that the gentleman from Illinois made against the gentleman from Alabama was that he sent a speech which the Age-Herald refused to accept.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that.

Mr. POU. Now, surely the gentleman has a right to reply to that.

The SPEAKER. Surely he has, and that is exactly what the Chair ruled.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, in that connection the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] read an editorial from the Age-Herald, saying that I had sent "collect" a speech in question. I did not do any such thing. I have paid for press dispatches from time to time, and my reason for it has been that I have not been able to get in touch with the representative of the Age-Herald on those occasions, and when I had something that I thought was of value to the people of Alabama, statements about the cotton situation and other things, I paid for them out of my own pocket, because I could not get in touch with the brilliant representative of the Age-Herald in this city. I have done that repeatedly. The Western Union Telegraph Co. made a statement, which the Age-Herald published, saying that Mr. HEFLIN has from time to time paid for these press dispatches regarding cotton and other things, and that Mr. HEFLIN paid for that other message carrying his speech, and did not send it collect. Now, whoever furnished the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] with the editorial attacking me, misrepresenting me, charging me falsely with having sent a speech collect, has also imposed upon him. The Age-Herald afterwards had another editorial acknowledging its fault, and apologizing for what it had done, for the wrong it had done me in its first editorial. Whoever furnished the gentleman from Illinois with that editorial ought to have been fair and honest enough to have given to him the other editorial and put me in right, instead of trying to put me in wrong before the country. [Applause.] Now, I am glad my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asked that question. I can not understand the Age-Herald's position here in that first editorial attacking me. We have been on the friendliest of terms. They do say in my State that the paper is afraid I am going to oppose its friend for a high office in Alabama, and that it is seeking to discredit and belittle me in the efforts that I am making here to faithfully serve my country. I do not fear them on that score. I have no newspaper in Alabama, but I have got the ear of the people of Alabama, which is better than any newspaper. Now, gentlemen, just think about this thing of sending a whole speech into a State attacking a Member in this fashion. I never sent a speech to anybody's State to try to interfere with you in your districts or your States. I have never published any of my speeches criticizing these gentlemen in their districts or States. Why was I singled out in this particular instance, and how did the gentleman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that the gentleman has said on this floor that he would carry the propaganda into the districts of Members of the House, and is it not a fact that he has gone into the districts of other Members and made speeches criticizing other Members?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I have not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has not the gentleman made speeches in Illinois?

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not believe that I ever made a speech in Illinois.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has never spoken in Chicago?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I have been invited to a number of times, and I shall go there this fall. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. This thing must not degenerate into a debate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was simply making an inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows, and under other conditions it would be all right.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has been into many States——

The SPEAKER. There is no occasion for the gentleman from Alabama giving his biography here to-day. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] attacks me and impugns my motives and said I was playing politics. I repeat that is not my motive. Here is what I replied to; here is what I was talking about. The gentleman in this solemn place made a speech, and in it he made the suggestion that no woman who had ever gone through a high school ever remembered before when boys were conscripted to go and fight to settle the title to real estate in Europe.

What is that statement? It is an indictment of my country's position. It misrepresents our position, if I understand our position. We are not fighting to settle the title to real estate in Europe. When this bloody-handed monster of the Old World reached out into the seas and tore down our flag, destroyed our commerce, and murdered our citizens we never thought of Alsace-Lorraine. When France marshaled her heroic army and made that brave stand at the battle of the Marne she never thought of Alsace-Lorraine, she thought of saving the life of the French Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking in order.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Alabama suspend? The Chair will take care of him.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma rise?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Illinois a few days ago, in the absence of the gentleman from Alabama, made a caustic attack on the gentleman from Alabama, and the gentleman from Alabama ought to have a few moments to make answer in his own way, and I ask unanimous consent that he have 20 minutes to do so.

Mr. SNYDER. I object.

Mr. MASON. I hope no objection will be made.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, may I say a word on the question of personal privilege? I understand the limitations which surround a Member when he undertakes to speak to a question of personal privilege, but conceding those limitations, I maintain that a Member is not confined to a denial of the matter which has been alleged against him, and to which he objects. The rule is very much like the rule which prevails in a case of slander in the civil courts. When a man slanderously assails another, the latter is permitted to retort somewhat in kind, in defending himself aganst the attacks of his slanderer. The rule in such a case is as follows in my State: Every man has a right to defend his character against false aspersion, and it is a duty which he owes his family to do this. If I am attacked in a newspaper, I may write to that paper to rebut the charges and at the same time may retort upon my assailant, when such a retort is a necessary part of my defense, and fairly arises out of the charges which he has made against me. When a Member of this body is charged with having done certain things with an improper and unworthy intent, parliamentary law does not restrain him in his response to this imputation, to a mere denial of the charge. He is permitted to give his version of his impelling motive, and to develop the facts which support his vindication, with appropriate illustrations, and within reasonable and parliamentary limits to counter upon his adversary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Virginia in that respect, but we can not under a question of privilege go into a history of our differences with the German nation in this war. The remarks that the gentleman from Alabama was making were outside of the question of personal privilege.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, instead of proceeding on the idea that I spoke because inspired by a desire to play politics, I was taking to task statements made on this floor by the gentleman from Illinois, which statements to my mind constitute an indictment of my country's position in this war.

Another one of the statements that I was replying to and from purely a patriotic motive was that the gentleman from Illinois said, "Looking it square in the face and no dodging, the only thing that stands between us and honorable peace is the disposition of Alsace-Lorraine."

Am I to be accused of playing politics when I challenge that statement? Why should gentlemen wish to deny me the right to be heard when I brand that statement as one that does not represent the facts of our position? Patriotic duty inspired me to challenge that statement. I have a duty to perform here as well as the boys over yonder, and so help me God this House shall not become the forum and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the vehicle to carry German propaganda over our country. [Applause.]

Fighting about the disposition of Alsace and Lorraine? No. Then I am not trying to play politics, and I am in order in discussing this grave and serious accusation. Alsace-Lorraine! Fighting to see who shall control that little strip of territory in the old world.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I object to this on the ground that we are not here to discuss the questions of the war. I have no objection, if it is correct under the rule, to the gentleman's saying anything he pleases about the gentleman from Illinois or about himself, but I do not think we are here to discuss the questions of the war, and I object on that ground.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that the gentleman from Alabama took the remark of the gentleman from Illinois that we were fighting to settle real estate matters in Europe as in some way applying to himself. If so, he has a perfect right to answer.

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not want to dispute the rulings of the Chair, and will not, but the gentleman having made this particular reference to Alsace-Lorraine twice in exactly the same language, and the gentleman from Illinois having referred to it only once, I want to ask whether it shall be repeated now for the third time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not going to enter into any mathematical calculations.

Mr. HEFLIN. To show that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has not even read the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON], I wish to remind him that he does refer to it twice. He states in one place that no woman who ever went through high school ever knew boys conscripted before to fight to settle title to real estate in Europe, and in another place he states that the only thing that stands between us and an honorable peace is the disposition of Alsace-Lorraine. My God! Such an indictment of my country! American boys fighting at the front while we are mobilizing our forces here to move against the bloody-handed monster of the world who seeks to destroy our liberty! I am surprised and utterly astounded that any man can be found in this House who will want to hamper me in denying for my country the truth of that suggestion. I can not understand it, gentlemen. Now, I hold this view, that if the gentleman does put this Government in a wrong attitude, and if I sit here in silence and permit it, I am a party to the offense of traducing my country and helping to spread a propaganda which is hurtful to my country. That is my position. Why should I not be permitted to reply to those things. I have not said anything about the gentleman from Illinois personally. I do not discuss things of a personal nature upon the floor of this House, and this is not the place to discuss them. I am discussing his public acts and utterances, and I can not understand why he permitted himself to be the vehicle to bring into this House an untruthful Age-Herald editorial which put me in a false light. They did me an injustice by not furnishing the other editorial, or he did me an injustice by not reading it.

I have got nearly 300 letters about the gentleman from Illinois, but I am not going to read them here. His difficulties at home can be settled by him and the people there, and things they say about him, let them say them and publish them there. I have a stack of newspaper clippings here, all this, about the gentleman from Illinois—papers from all over the country; but I am not going to read them to this House unless I have to. That is my position upon that phase of the question. I am taking him to task for what he said here, for what is in the RECORD. What else did he say in that speech? I am not after him trying to play politics. I am answering his speech. What did he say? Why, he has an insinuation in it that Japan has got an agreement with some foreign power to fight us at some future time.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I do not think the gentleman has any right to bring Japan into this controversy. He is covering the whole country, the whole war with his argument.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains that point, and the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the Chair does not understand my statement, probably. I am replying to what Mr. MASON said, that Japan had an alliance with some foreign power to fight us at some future time.

The SPEAKER. Let the Chair ask the gentleman a question. When was it that the gentleman from Illinois said such things as that—in the speech that was delivered here a few days ago?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; in the speech that I replied to; and he said in reply to that speech of mine that I was playing politics.

The SPEAKER. When did he say the gentleman from Alabama was playing politics?

Mr. HEFLIN. In the speech that I am talking about now; the one made here April the 6th.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Illinois link the gentleman from Alabama up with the Japanese in any way?

Mr. HEFLIN. He charged that I was playing politics and trying to insult him. I was replying to his speech, and I am now saying what it was that I did reply to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will confine himself as closely as possible to the question of privilege.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I can not yield any more. I am sorry, but I have been interrupted so much that I want to finish in the next couple of hours, if I can. What I was going to say was that Japan is an ally of Great Britain, one of our allies, and she was here expressing a desire to aid us in any way that she could in this war, and I was objecting to any Member of the American Congress throwing cold water on Japan or upon her sincerity when she was expressing friendship for this Nation.

I do not think that any Member here should say a word or do a thing that will offend any nation friendly to us in this trying time. [Applause.] Now that is one of the things I replied to in the gentleman's speech, and he says I was playing politics, trying to insult him. That was not my purpose. Another thing that the gentleman said that I do not think should go unchallenged, and that was since the secret treaties have been published between our allies, they showed that England, France, and Russia were going to slice up Germany. What does that statement mean, gentlemen? That our allies are not fighting for their very existence, but are out on a plunder tour, seeking to "slice up Germany"; that is the language. Slice up Germany! This country fighting with allies who are not fighting for self-preservation and liberty, but fighting to gain German territory? We know that the Kaiser started this war; we know that he was the only power in the world prepared for war in 1914, and that he forced the allies to fight for their existence. Then, why should a Member here be permitted to say that since the secret treaties have been published the fact is disclosed that they had an agreement to slice up Germany? Gentlemen, as I said, I called at the State Department, and they knew nothing about any such treaty. The allies deny the existence of such a treaty, and the only evidence of such a treaty is the conjured-up stuff of hired agents of Germany. There is no such treaty, the allies say, yet a Member on this floor says that since the secret treaties have been published our English cousins, our French friends, and Russian allies are going to slice up Germany. Gentlemen, do you think that a statement like that should be permitted to go out from this place? Do you believe that the fathers and mothers of our boys who are fighting and dying for us in France should have to read such stuff as that, that our brave allies are fighting to slice up Germany? These boys are fighting to save the life of this Nation from the dangers that threaten it. [Applause.] These boys are fighting for our liberty, and not for any secret agreement.

The allies are fighting because they were forced to fight. These are the charges and insinuations that I am answering. Does it look like I was trying to play cheap politics? The gentleman from Illinois spoke during my absence, but he did not answer a single one of these points, not one. In one place in that speech he did say, "For God's sake, let us quit fighting among ourselves and fight the Kaiser." Gentlemen, I rejoiced when I read that. I said I have got him going in the right direction now I have got him saying, "Let us fight the Kaiser." Now, you go and read that speech and see if you can find one line in it where he assails the German Kaiser, where he assails the brutality of the German Government, the Kaiser, and his brutal army; but there are a lot of flings in it at the allies and a lot of doubts and misgivings cast upon this Government's position in the war. In his last speech—the one made while I was gone—he said, "The Kaiser, that old devil." Well, he is still improving. I have got him calling the Kaiser an old devil. I believe he is coming through. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Illinois said, "Let us not fight among ourselves, but fight the Kaiser." Good; and the next time, "The Kaiser, that old devil," and that is still better. The next time I want to hear him say that that brutal, blood-thirsty monarch is the cause of all this trouble and destruction, but we are going to conquer him. That is what I want to see and hear.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Alabama has come to a climax. [Laughter.] He has reached a point where he agrees with the gentleman from Illinois, and I want to ask, within the rules, if it is not sufficient for one day? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I decline to be interrupted by the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HEFLIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, far from my desire or intention to assail the gentleman from Illinois for political purposes, I replied to his speech because I felt it my patriotic duty to do so. I replied to suggestions that he made in that speech. There will be no rioting among the people in the United States, he went on to say. Listen, gentlemen, they will not riot, he says, because they know that in the cool and quiet days of November they will be heard. What does he mean by that? Does he mean that this Government, through the Congress and through President Wilson, the greatest man in all the world [applause], has drawn this country into a war that the people do not indorse, and that the disposition to riot is there, but that they will not riot because they will vote their disapproval in November? According to my humble judgment there are but two meanings in that statement. One is that they are against their Government in the war and the other is that they will cowardly repudiate it in November, and yet I am arraigned through his speech in the Age-Herald of my State for some strange and mysterious reason for criticizing a speech which has in it these awful, ugly, and unfounded charges against my country.

That is the offense that I have committed. Am I to be ridiculed by a gentleman in or out of Congress because of the patriotic stand I have taken? I am willing to do and to suffer. While these boys are fighting over yonder, with people of my own blood in the Army, I am willing to suffer unwarranted criticism even by the hired agents of the German Government, and I am ready, if need be, to die for my country. That is where I stand.

On another occasion here the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] saw fit to refer in a sneering way to a difficulty that I had on a street car some years ago while protecting a northern white woman from the brutality and insolence of a drunken negro. The gentleman from Wisconsin has lugged that incident into this place. I had finally to shoot the negro, and, in the difficulty, a white man was accidentally shot by me.

He was confined to the hospital for a month. I attended him, with trained nurses and some of the best physicians in the city, aided by my brother, Dr. Wyatt Heflin, of Birmingham. Caring for this man and nursing him back to health cost me nearly $2,000, but I have never regretted my act of protecting that white woman from the insults and insolence of that drunken negro. [Applause.] Am I to be ridiculed on the floor of the House years after by a Northern Republican for trying to do my duty to a woman of my own race on a street car in the city of Washington?

Mr. MASON. I did not mention that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HEFLIN. I know you did not. I wanted to yoke him in——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To make the point of order which I promised to make at the outset.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Would it be in order to remind the belligerent gentleman from Alabama that I did not mention the fact that he had, in attempting to defend a white woman, shot a white man? I did not know before that that was his excuse for the shooting, and I never saw it printed. I made no reference to the subject at all, and as I recall the newspaper reports they were entirely different and his conduct was accounted for on vastly different grounds. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Here is what the gentleman said. He said, "We remember the courage and gallantry of the gentleman as displayed a few years ago in this city," or words to that effect. That is what I am referring to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I did not say that in those words. What I said was this, that the gentleman has a well-established reputation in this community for courage, we all know. That is right.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is the occasion that I am referring to.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Give me five minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I insist on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. HEFLIN. I can finish in five minutes. Mr. Speaker, I have been interrupted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman was interrupted, but the Chair must take into consideration the rules of the House.

Mr. HEFLIN. I would like to have five minutes more. I was interrupted frequently, the Chair will recall.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I did not realize that I had occupied the floor for an hour. I regret that I am not going to be permitted to conclude my remarks. There are a great many things in this connection that I wanted to say and that I may have to say later on.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON], in attacking me in various ways, said that I was not willing to go to war but wanted to sacrifice my sister's son. Mr. Speaker, that boy is in the uniform of his country. My only son is in a military school, a 17-year-old boy now in training for the service of his country. I volunteered my services to the President the next day after he issued the war proclamation, but he said that he needed me in this House worse than he needed me at the battle front. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois speaks of me as walking down Pennsylvania Avenue and being surprised that the thing did not turn over and bow to me. Well, I never noticed where the gentleman walked. I am after him about what he says in this body. He also said here that I had manicured eyebrows, and I never heard of manicured eyebrows before. [Laughter.] He says I cast a glance at the ladies in the gallery. God bless them. [Laughter and applause.] These good women come here each day and sit in the gallery knitting for our soldiers and witnessing the passage of these mighty war measures. I submit to this House that these patriotic ladies are entitled to rest their gaze upon me as a measure of relief from some other objects that I know hereabout. [Laughter.] They are entitled to feast their eyes upon me and other patriots in this body rather than suffer the constant affliction of gazing upon this walking advertisement of nuxated iron. [Laughter and applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 123) providing for the calling into military service of certain classes of persons registered and liable for military service under the terms of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4292. An act to conserve the gold supply of the United States, to permit the settlement in silver of trade balances adverse to the United States; to provide silver for subsidiary coinage and for commercial use; to assist foreign Governments at war with the enemies of the United States; and for the above purposes to stabilize the price and encourage the production of silver.

LIABILITY TO MILITARY SERVICE OF CERTAIN REGISTERED PERSONS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is recognized.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman yield. I understand that the Senate has disagreed to the House amendment to Senate joint resolution No. 123 and asks for a conference. I will ask that the House agree to the conference and that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS], the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and myself be named as conferees.

Mr. CANNON. What is the resolution?

Mr. DENT. The resolution is in regard to the quota bill which we passed with an amendment several days ago. I ask unanimous consent that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate on Senate joint resolution 123.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the House agree to the conference asked by the Senate on Senate joint resolution 123. Is there objection?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know if the gentleman from Alabama will advise us, that before agreeing with the Senate on the question of credit for volunteers, he will give the House an opportunity to express itself on the same?

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman from Virginia that I have been in favor of that proposition all along.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I know that.

Mr. DENT. And expect to stand by it. I have no objection to stating that in view of the tremendous vote in favor of that proposition, before I agree I will bring it back to the House.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, we have not heard a word about the agreement just made.

Mr. DENT. I stated, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Virginia, that in view of the tremendous vote in favor of giving credit for volunteers, I would not agree to the Senate amendment with respect to that without bringing the matter back to the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this is the only question of difference between the two Houses, is it not?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me, then, that the gentleman is going into the conference without the prospect of being able to confer if such an agreement is made.

Mr. DENT. Well, I will state to the gentleman that there are two propositions involved in the differences between the two Houses—one amendment, but two propositions involved—one giving credit for enlistments in the Regular Army and in the National Guard and the other extending credit to enlistments in the Navy.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that inasmuch as that is the only real question involved in the difference between the two Houses, if the conferees come together with the understanding that they will not confer there is no use in having a conference.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Reserving the right to object, I would like to say, in response to the objection just made, that the action suggested by me, is precisely what was done a day or two ago with respect to the $2.50 per bushel wheat proposition when it went to conference. Further it is entirely competent for this body at this time to instruct its conferees not to agree to the action of the Senate striking out the House provision relating to credit for volunteers.

I do not however propose to move to instruct our conferees. It may be that the Senate will recede from its amendment—but in view of what the gentleman from Alabama has said concerning the tremendous vote in the House in favor of credit for volunteers, I have asked him if he would be willing, before coming to any final agreement or understanding with the Senate conferees to bring the matter back to the House. This he has stated that he will do. Hence I withdraw my objection to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. DENT. At the request of Gen. Crowder the Senate has held up this conference, so that he could make an investigation as to the effect that this credit system would have upon the classification authorized by the bill. It will take only a short time for us to get those facts. If Gen. Crowder is correct in his statement that he made to me—I may be mistaken in the view that I entertain on the subject—but on account of the fact that this House voted—294 to 65, I believe—in favor of the credit system, I think I ought to bring those additional facts back to the House before agreeing to the Senate proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Does that apply to both the credit proposition in the Army and in the Navy?

Mr. DENT. Yes; certainly. He is investigating both.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] asks unanimous consent to have appointed a new conference on this resolution 123. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN.

REPORT FROM COMMITTEE ON RULES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report (No. 508) from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois presents a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 319.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11259; that there shall be not exceeding two hours of general debate, the time to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] and one-half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND]; that all debate shall be confined to the said bill, at the end of which time the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule, and at the conclusion of such reading the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House, together with the amendments, if any, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; if the gentleman wants to offer a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I want to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to withdraw the conference report filed on the bill H. R. 8696, the Indian appropriation bill, in order that we may get back into conference. Our report has been filed and the Senate has rejected the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to withdraw the conference report heretofore filed on the Indian appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman in charge of the bill. I understand that there was an item which caused the Senate to reject the conference report. I desire to inquire whether, upon this conference report being returned to the conferees, it is the intention of the conferees to take up any of the other items that have been in controversy and in conference?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Of course, if it is returned the gentleman understands it opens up every item in the bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I desire to know if the conferees propose to take up any of these items with a view to a contrary decision?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I can not say what items we will go into, but there are some that ought to be gone into.

Mr. SHERLEY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, with the gentleman's permission, I think a word should be said about the peculiar situation that confronts this House by virtue of the more than peculiar rule that the Senate has adopted touching conference reports and the action that that body has recently taken touching this report.

The Senate has adopted a rule which was intended to be in substance the rule long prevalent in this House, that a conference report which undertook to bring into or leave out of the bill matters that were not in dispute between the two Houses would be subject to a point of order; but instead of stopping there, they proceed upon the assumption that only the Senate is a party to a conference, and that therefore it is for them to say how and when and where the conference will be dealt with. And they provide that upon a point of order being made the bill shall be immediately recommitted to the committee of conference. They have no more power to recommit it to the committee of conference by such a declaration than they have to pass it and make it a law by their own action without consulting this House. Of course, this House is not going to stand for any such usurpation of power on the part of the Senate. They have the right to make such rules as they see fit touching what their conferees may do. They have the right to reject conference reports; but when they reject them, it is the right of this House either to agree to a further conference or not, as it may see fit; and as this matter is going to be one that may come up in the future, it is well that the House should understand just what is involved in the position that has been taken by the Senate upon this bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It ought to be stated that the particularly troublesome matter in that rule, the absolutely unworkable proposition in it, has been called to the attention of members of the committee of the other body that have to do with that rule.

Mr. SHERLEY. It is not only unworkable, but it is a piece of presumption that is unparalleled in the history of legislative bodies.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It would destroy legislation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May I ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I did not understand that the new rule of the Senate was susceptible of the interpretation which the gentleman from Kentucky now gives it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, I will read the rule.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. Let me state what my understanding of that rule was. I would like to have the gentleman from Kentucky see if this is or is not his understanding. My understanding of that rule is that when the point of order was raised in the Senate the Senate would recommit the bill to its own conferees, that then the House would be notified of that action of the Senate, and the House, in its discretion, could return the bill or agree to the conference.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well—but there are no conferees when the report is rejected. That ends the conference.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understand that technical point, but the bill would be handed back to the men who had been the conferees of the Senate. Everybody understands that.

Mr. SHERLEY. But that is not what the rule says. The rule says:

> If new matter be inserted in the report, or if matter which was agreed to in both Houses is stricken from the bill, a point of order may be made against the report; and if the point of order is sustained the report shall be recommitted to the committee of conference.

Now, the very moment that a conference report is rejected there ceases to be a committee of conference. There are no longer either House or Senate conferees to whom the bill can be recommitted; and I repeat that it is one of the most remarkable performances by a legislative body that has ever come to my personal attention.

Now, the decision which they have made in this particular instance is also interesting because it has very far-reaching results. The Senate put an amendment upon the Indian appropriation bill in the nature of a proviso upon an appropriation, which provided that certain character of claims and leases other than oil and gas claims should be treated in a certain manner. The House disagreed to the Senate amendment, and it and other amendments went into conference. In conference the conferees of the House and the Senate agreed to the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out the words of limitation which excluded oil and gas leases, whereupon a point of order was made on the ground that as the Senate had limited its amendment to a certain character of leases that did not affect oil and gas the conferees could not make the limitation embrace such leases. Now, it has been the rule of this House for a great many years that even words of limitation could be stricken out of a paragraph without such a motion being subject to a point of order. Personally I have always thought that rule had only precedent to sanction it; that the logic of the case ought to make it as much out of order to enlarge the scope of a legislative provision by eliminating words as it would be by adding words, and that the true rule should be whether the effect of the amendment to strike out was to change the character of the matter pending. Evidently the Senate has taken that position upon this matter, and that is a matter clearly within their right and not for us to complain of. They have the right to reject a report for any reason that they see fit; but having rejected it, they have no right to insist that the House shall go to conference upon their terms. And in order that the House may not be limited in its judgment as to what it desires, I trust that the gentleman in charge of this bill may suggest that instead of going to conference on the whole bill we go to conference on the bill with an amendment to the Senate amendment, presenting squarely the proposition that they saw fit to throw out, not because I favor it, for I do not know anything about its merits, but in order that the Senate may understand that it takes two legislative bodies to go to conference and to pass laws in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what would be the situation if the House should refuse to give unanimous consent to send this bill back to conference?

Mr. SHERLEY. I presume that if the Senate had sent the papers back—assuming that they have the papers—with the statement that they asked for a conference, then it would be in order either to take the papers from the Speaker's table or to send them to the committee for such action as the Committee on Indian Affairs might want to take.

Mr. WALSH. If that course were not followed, would we not in a way become associated in the folly which the Senate has perpetrated in adopting this rule?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not understand that the gentleman from Oklahoma has asked for a conference. He simply has asked that the conference report that has been presented here be withdrawn.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Just a moment. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. When these papers are withdrawn, if we get unanimous consent to withdraw them, then what will be the parliamentary status of the conference? Will we be back in conference or not?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WALSH. How will the bill get back in conference under the circumstances which have been stated here?

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent.

Mr. WALSH. Then I am going to object.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman from Kentucky will yield for a question——

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. In a case such as we have before us, where legislation of very great importance that has not been considered by either the House or the Senate is added to an appropriation bill in conference, and that additional matter, as it happens, is put in by the striking out of language, but, as a matter of fact, is in violation of the spirit of the House rule if not its letter—and I admit that the precedents are as the gentleman says—and under the Senate rules the action of the conferees is out of order, I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think in a case like that the House would be unwise to agitate itself unduly about the matter?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman seems not to understand what the House is concerning itself with. It is not the action of the Senate in rejecting the conference report. I have no criticism of that. It is the assumption in their rule, and action under their rule, that when a conference report has a point of order made to it that it shall immediately go back to conference. Now, that means that they determine how long a conference shall continue. What the Senate ought to do is what the House does under similar circumstances. When a point of order is made to a conference report, and the point of order is sustained, the House then advises the Senate that the conference report having been presented, a point of order having been made against it, the point of order was sustained and the conference report was rejected because it was beyond the power of the House conferees to agree to it. The Senate should simply advise the House that a point of order having been made and sustained to the conference report, the conference report has been rejected by the Senate. Then the matter is as if there had never been a conference. But they are not satisfied to do that. The people who drew the rule seemed to forget that anybody was concerned except the Senate. So they said that whenever a point of order was made against a conference report and sustained the bill shall immediately go back to conference.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MADDEN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. Would not this report as it stands to-day ordinarily go to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. MADDEN. The Senate struck out a part of the bill, and the question is whether or not the language they struck out ought not to be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts adhere to his objection?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

MINERALS AND METALS FOR WAR PURPOSES.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the report of the Committee on Rules which is presented provides for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11259, a bill to provide for the mineral war materials that the Government will need during this war. The rule provides for two hours of general debate, and after that that the bill shall be read under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to ask the gentleman if the general debate is to be confined to the subject of the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. The rule provides that it shall be confined to the bill because the time is short and the committee thought it should be confined to the subject matter of the bill.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Illinois ought to give the House some reason for adopting the rule for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that there is an urgent reason why the bill should be adopted. The Shipping Board has taken over the ships carrying many of these articles to this country so that when they are taken off it will make all the more urgent the passage of this bill so that we may have an opportunity to secure sufficient war minerals. It is necessary in our own country that we should be as independent as possible in a time of war. Nobody knows what will be possible in the future in reference to importations, and so we believe that many of these minerals can be produced in our own country if proper attention is given to it. That is the reason for this bill. The men who have to do with the looking up of minerals came before our committee, men who have to do with minerals for war and industrial purposes, decided that the bill was one of urgent necessity. Some men who have these things in charge said that the bill should be passed now, not to-morrow or next day, but now, because it is imperative and the necessity was growing greater all the time. That is the reason that this rule has been presented.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. When was the measure first introduced?

Mr. FOSTER. Some weeks ago, not as a bill at that time but as a committee print. It was taken up by the committee and afterwards introduced.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that the gentleman states that the purpose of the bill is to make us independent.

Mr. FOSTER. We hope it will as near as possible to do so.

Mr. WALSH. In administering this law, if it shall become a law, the gentleman does not think that it is going to make mining, the production of metals and minerals, any easier in this country?

Mr. FOSTER. No; it will not make it any easier, but it will enable an organization to go out through the country and look up the development of these minerals. There was an item in an appropriation bill to provide a certain amount of money to ascertain what the mineral resources of the country are.

Mr. WALSH. Would not the existing machinery, with a little increased appropriation, have full power and authority to do many of the things stipulated in the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. Those testifying before the committee did not think so.

Mr. McKENZIE rose.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I will yield first to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it not true that the Bureau of Mines has all the crew and organization to get the mining resources of the country?

Mr. FOSTER. They have made an investigation in different parts of the country, but they have not an organization to go out and do what we are contemplating.

Mr. McKENZIE. Under this bill, would it be possible for the Government to operate mines?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not intended that the Government shall operate mines unless the mine is one that is not being operated or insufficiently operated. For instance, it is said that in one State there is a prospect for tin in a mine that has been in litigation for many years; nobody can operate it, and nobody knows whether there is sufficient tin there or not. In a case of that kind, if it became necessary, the Government could go in and do it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I notice in section 1 it is set out with great particularity the kinds of metals it is intended the Government shall endeavor to produce and conserve. I assume that the committee arrived at that list after a great deal of investigation and receiving the opinions of men who are competent to judge in matters of that kind.

Mr. FOSTER. The committee had the advice of men who are skilled.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This is an extremely technical proposition. I understand that where there is a lot of iron in the country and capacity to make certain kinds of steel, it may be there is a shortage of certain hardening elements essential in the higher grades of steel. That applies not only to this country but to any other country. Has the committee been careful to make certain that this list contains all of the precious metals that might be necessary for purposes of the character indicated?

Mr. FOSTER. The committee has thought that this comprises all of them. There may be some that have been overlooked.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The reason I mention that is that I have looked this over and read it many times and I can think of several that I think ought to be there, but I confess I am not an expert.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be that there were some that were overlooked.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. The bill carries an authorization for an expenditure of $50,000,000. Of course, it is put in there with the expectation that immediately following its passage the Committee on Appropriations will appropriate that sum.

Mr. FOSTER. The committee hopes so.

Mr. SHERLEY. So that what is really presented to the House is a proposition in substance to appropriate $50,000,000 for the development of the mining industry. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. We have just recently passed an act, unprecedented in the history of this country at least, with power to expend moneys in sums many times the amount carried in this bill for the financing of many kinds of corporations. What need is there that we should further burden the Treasury with direct appropriations in order to develop these mineral resources, even assuming that anybody can find any that ought to be developed that otherwise will not be developed?

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman knows that often mining is a precarious business and an unusually hazardous undertaking.

Mr. SHERLEY. So precarious that Uncle Sam must foot the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I am not ready to say that yet; but the gentleman will permit me to finish and say that there are many small mines throughout the United States—little miners who have not the capital—who can not go to the great corporations and secure financial help.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why can they not go to this Government corporation?

Mr. FOSTER. Because they will not loan to that kind of a mine; they are not developed.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why not? Is the gentleman authorized to say that Mr. McAdoo's corporation will not do business except with big folk?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no; I did not say that.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is the implication to be drawn from the gentleman's remark.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman knows that I have not said anything about that; but I said that the man who had a little mine, that might produce during the war and be a profitable mine, will not be profitable when the war closes. The gentleman knows that it would not be wise for a corporation to put money into that kind of a mine; they would not think it wise to do so, and yet the Government might get much material in that way.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would just as lief the Government should loan aid as that it should pay. It might get back part of its loan and it may not get back any of its payment.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes; the Government will go out and buy this material for use by the Government. In the steel business last year they used 800,000 tons of manganese. Secretary Lane, in his testimony, said there is in sight in this country for this year 240,000 tons of manganese. We must develop manganese, if we are to make steel. I saw two gentlemen the other day who came into my office, going to New York to see this board of which the gentleman speaks. They were developing a tungsten mine, and they were going there to see if they could get financial help. They did not know whether they could get it or not, as they said mining was a peculiar business, as men who engage in it know, and so it might be difficult to get the money.

Mr. SHERLEY. The peculiar phase that I object to is that the committee insists on a direct appropriation out of the Treasury. This is not the only business that is hazardous. What the gentleman is asking is that this Congress shall now turn in and appropriate $50,000,000 for the purpose of developing various and sundry mineral prospects of various and sundry people.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. SHERLEY. That is what it gets down to.

Mr. FOSTER. The $50,000,000 is not for that purpose. It is this, that they may go and stabilize the price, so that a man is able to go out——

Mr. SHERLEY. What does the gentleman mean by that—to buy it?

Mr. FOSTER. I mean to fix their price for this product—get it developed in this country.

Mr. SHERLEY. But you have now absolute control of that without this legislation.

Mr. FOSTER. You can not make them go and develop it.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; you can not make them develop it, but you can fix the price, because the Government is almost the exclusive purchaser, and by virtue of its power to issue priority orders and in other ways it can make itself the exclusive purchaser of any mineral in the country.

Mr. FOSTER. We had men before the committee who had to do with these minerals who told us differently.

Mr. SHERLEY. They have not the power to fix directly the price, but they have the power to fix it indirectly, because they are practically the only buyers of most of the minerals the gentleman is proposing to develop.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no, they are not.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then, why are you developing them, if the Government does not need the minerals?

Mr. FOSTER. Because we have several industries.

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; but the industries are being used on account of Government work and again we have control of the industries.

Mr. FOSTER. But we have to have chrome, manganese, and many of the other minerals.

Mr. SHERLEY. But we do not have to make this appropriation in order to get them. That is the gentleman's assumption.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is wrong. We must have this appropriation if we are to secure these necessary minerals.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. FOSTER. I will for a question.

Mr. WALSH. How was it that gentlemen who appeared before the committee happened to hit upon $50,000,000? Was that because the fashion now is to make appropriations——

Mr. FOSTER. I can not tell the gentleman. Of course, that is a matter that is fixed on, and I do not know whether $50,000,000 is an appropriate amount or not. It is impossible to tell just how much is necessary, but the committee believes this amount is not too much.

Mr. WALSH. Was it based on any estimate which was gone into?

Mr. FOSTER. There was no estimate made except the revolving fund which was necessary to be used, which was put at $50,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. Would not the object of this measure be accomplished if we passed an authorization and allow the financing of the project to be left to the War Finance Corporation, as suggested by the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think so.

Mr. WALSH. Why, if it is urgent for the Government? Does the gentleman think the War Finance Corporation will refuse assistance to individuals and corporations that are engaged in producing or manufacturing or transporting matters or materials that are essential in war industries?

Mr. FOSTER. Many of these mines are small mines——

Mr. WALSH. But they are owned by somebody.

Mr. FOSTER. Away from the railroads. Oh, yes; they are owned by somebody.

Mr. WALSH. And they may need assistance.

Mr. FOSTER. It is necessary to go to these people and show them how to develop them. They are not large mines, many of them, but small mines.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, the Government or some organization has to go out and show them the way to develop those mines in order to get the minerals.

Mr. WALSH. I agree it is necessary to develop them, but why can not the development, as far as the financing of the proposition goes, be done under the funds furnished to this War Finance Corporation? Let us confer authority on the Secretary of the Interior; but as far as the finances go, let it go to the War Finance Corporation to make these loans.

Mr. FOSTER. There might be a little mine which might need aid and——

Mr. WALSH. But they can go and have it inspected and——

Mr. FOSTER. But they are not going to do that.

Mr. WALSH. Then the statement that was made here when we discussed the bill that it was to help the small operators was erroneous.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask my colleague, in speaking of the small operators, has this legislation been asked for by the small mine operators of the country, or is it a governmental project in the sense that the representatives of the Government came before your committee and asked you to pass it?

Mr. FOSTER. The representatives of the Government came before our committee.

Mr. HAMLIN. And of the State governments?

Mr. FOSTER. And of the State governments. Every geologist in the United States, men who are connected with the War Mineral Board, the Secretary of the Interior—all of those men came before the committee urging this legislation be enacted.

Mr. McKENZIE. This bill is not the result, then, of a propaganda put out by men who are engaged in promoting——

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all.

Mr. McKENZIE (continuing). Mining enterprises and wanting to unload on the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all; it is not at all.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I will.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think there is a wrong impression prevailing as to the purpose of the bill. This bill only affects certain scarce minerals, a very few compared with the whole class of minerals of this country. It only affects those, so our committee was told by experts who ought to know and I think do know, which are vitally necessary in the manufacturing of war materials, munitions, and so forth, and a very large percentage of the minerals affected by this bill are not produced except in negligible quantities in this country, hence must be imported. We need the ships now engaged in carrying these materials from Spain, from China, from Japan, and from other countries, and those ships ought to be released so as to be used for other purposes. Now, the geologists of this country tell us that we have an abundance of a great many of these minerals in this country, and we have, undoubtedly, if developed. Now the purpose of the $50,000,000 which is sought to be authorized in this bill is not that intimated by the gentleman from Kentucky, but this was an arbitrary amount put in the bill with the hope that it would be sufficient to enable the President to carry out the purposes of this bill.

One man testified before our committee to a pyrite mine that had been developed in a way. He had his prospect and had sunk his shaft and found his ore there. He is a farmer. He is not able to go on and develop his mine and take chances on the prices of his ore. His mine is several miles from a railroad. That man could not come to this board the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] talks about and borrow money in order to develop his mine, but under this bill, if it becomes a law, and the Government should say that pyrite for a certain period of time, like we have said about wheat, shall not fall below a certain price per ton for a period of, say, two years, that man can get money to go in there and develop that mine and produce pyrite in large quantity. And that is true as to all the minerals mentioned in this bill, except as to tin. We do not hope to find enough tin in the United States. But most of the minerals in this bill, geologists tell us, we can find in this country, and that they are here if we can develop them. And we are hoping that not one single penny of this $50,000,000 may be needed. If it is, it may become necessary to go and buy some of these minerals; but if we do, the bill provides that the Government can turn around and sell it to the steel manufacturers of this country and get the money back.

Mr. WALSH. It will have to be raised by taxation, will it not?

Mr. HAMLIN. To be sure; but when the Government sells these minerals to the manufacturers this money will come back to the Government.

Mr. McKENZIE. When you speak of stabilizing prices, do you mean under this legislation the Government will raise the price to a point where a man or a corporation is operating one of these mining plants on, perhaps, a low grade of ore, and it is difficult to get it out, that under the price which you term the stabilized price they will be enabled to operate that mine, whereas they would not be at the price now prevailing?

Mr. HAMLIN. I mean that under this the Government has the right to fix a guaranteed minimum price, but that may not be uniform throughout the United States. The Government will take into consideration the cost of producing the ore, say, in Georgia, in Alabama, or up in Michigan or Wisconsin, and its proximity to market. And all these things will be taken into consideration. But that guaranteed price will be such a price as will guarantee to the people that put their money into the development of these mines, into the installation of machinery, and so forth, such a price that they will know they are not going to be absolutely ruined by the price going down shortly after the machinery is installed, but will receive not less than a certain price for a stipulated time. And in that way we will encourage the production in our own country of these vital minerals.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The point raised by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], it seems to me, has no direct bearing on the purpose of this bill, for this reason: The Finance Corporation is authorized to loan money on securities, advance money on going concerns, let money go to banks and to manufacturing institutions that are manufacturing shells, artillery, and this, that, and the other. They have got to have security. The purpose of this is not to loan money to enable people to go ahead conducting an already going concern. The Government is not in the loaning business under this bill, as I understand its purposes. In these war operations there are many metals vitally essential that hitherto have not been in a large measure mined in this country, and some not at all, but they do exist, and the Government is going into the business of taking charge of the situation to see to it that these minerals are produced and that they get to the men that need them. And there is no other agency to do it.

Now, if I can be permitted to give an illustration that I think is pertinent. The steamer Cyclops sank the other day. It is no improper statement to say that she carried manganese from South America, manganese that is vitally needed by this country. We know that ships from South America coming to this country have been cut off largely, except for a few vital things.

Mr. HAMLIN. And more ought to be shut off.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And more will be. I know where there are millions of tons of manganese existing. It is always admixed with other things. It has not been commercially valuable particularly, but it is of vital necessity that we have manganese, and if the supply from South America is shut off the Government can very easily take steps to have these deposits produce the manganese that is vitally necessary.

And I am going to say this out loud. I hope it will have some bearing on the consideration of this proposition. I learned from the highest authorities in Great Britain, who were keeping their eyes constantly on the situation in Germany, that while Germany had all the iron she wanted and all the copper she could use, that she was suffering terrifically because she did not have certain hardening materials required to make refined steel out of iron. Her torpedoes no longer had the strength or the accuracy they once had, because nickel was about gone, and that while they could not starve Germany and could not destroy her by the very close blockade that has been carried on, Germany as a result thereof is suffering terrifically on account of the absence of many of these various metals that are named right in this list. I could duplicate many of them from the recollection I have of that statement. And from the time I learned of that until now it has seemed to me the highest necessity that this country, which heretofore has been bringing from foreign countries these elements so needed, that we turn at once to their production in this country.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, men may agree with most of what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] without agreeing at all to what they propose. Nobody who is at all familiar with the war and the war needs questions the need of a great many of these, what might be termed, secondary minerals. Nobody questions the desirability of enlarging the extent of the mining by which they are produced, but it does not follow from those conclusions that you have to appropriate $50,000,000 out of the Treasury for that purpose. That is the point on which I take issue with the two gentlemen. This bill provides, first, that we shall undertake to fix a price for all these minerals and guarantee that price over a certain length of time and pay anybody any loss that he may suffer for the price being less than that sum during the period for which we make such a guaranty. And in order to make sure that we will be able to maintain that guaranty, it also provides that we may enter into any contracts with various miners and mining industries for the production of minerals at a fixed price, and if gentlemen will look at section 14 they will see that my statement is warranted by the bill.

Now, there is no use in deceiving ourselves. What is intended is this, that the moment this bill is passed the Committee on Appropriations shall be called upon to appropriate $50,000,000, and the department will come in and insist that they have that much money. Why, to show you how much they think they need, they provide that the $50,000,000 shall be a revolving fund, and they shall continue to expend it over and over again.

Now, I maintain that under the power that the Government now has every proper purpose sought to be effected by this bill can be effected without additional legislation. We have already reached the point in this country where new enterprises, except with Government permission, are impossible. We have reached the point where old enterprises will not be permitted to continue except by Government permission, and that is as it should be, because the Government need is greater than that of any individual. But by virtue of priority orders, by virtue of control over fuel, by virtue of control of transportation and control in other directions, the Government is in this hour and in every hour determining what businesses shall go on, what businesses shall extend, and what shall stop. It can absolutely determine the price of the basic things of this character, because it is practically the sole purchaser, and anybody else who is a purchaser of these minerals is a purchaser nearly always for the purpose of doing Government work, and in most instances the Government is buying for the credit of such concerns now and is furnishing them with raw materials and it is being charged on the price of finished articles made for the Government; and therefore there is no need, in my judgment, for this attempt more fully to develop these resources out of the Treasury, and there is great danger in it, because there is always an invitation and a temptation to expend moneys in ways that are not wise and where there is no satisfactory reason for the expenditure.

Let me say a word for the House to remember: The Committee on Appropriations has certain discretions and certain discretions it has not. It is expected to obey the mandate, and particularly the recent mandate of Congress, and it tries to do it, and the very men who at one moment vote an authorization and compel the committee to appropriate moneys the next moment condemn the committee and the Congress and the administration for the expenditure of money along lines which are not warranted. We have gotten into the habit that every time some gentleman, either in the Cabinet or in a department, out of an over enthusiasm touching his activities, considers that it is necessary to do something, to introduce a bill and carry $50,000,000 or $150,000,000 or $350,000,000, as the man happens to be writing at the time seems to think. There are enough wild, crazy proposals coming before the Committee on Appropriations, some of them recommended by high officials in the Government, to make one wonder whether we can manufacture printing presses fast enough to print the money, because that is the only way we can pay the bill. We can not pay it with real money. We will have to develop the gold and silver mining industry away beyond anything that this bill can do in order to get money to pay for every new socialistic scheme that is in the head of some head of a department in this Government, and I beg this House to pause before it is swept off its feet by agitators of every special interest in this country. Naturally mining people want it and naturally every gentleman from a mining State will want it. That is natural, but it is not necessarily wise. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the adoption of this rule, and I am now opposed to the provisions of this measure in its present form. It does not necessarily follow that because a matter is called a "war measure" it is a war measure. But if it is a war measure, it does not necessarily follow that the Government shall go into this scheme on the scale outlined in this bill.

Now, we have seen what has occurred in price fixing as applied to wheat. We embarked upon that policy of guaranteeing a price, and we witnessed the divergence of views and the confusion that have resulted, as was stated here the other day.

Now, they are undertaking to encourage the production of a lot of minerals with, in many instances, unpronounceable names and some minerals and metals which we have never heard of before, and we are going to guarantee the price of those things, and by passing this legislation assume that the Government now is powerless to encourage or stimulate their production or to get sufficient supplies.

Now, I do not think that is the case. I do not believe that the intimations that have been made in the statement of the gentlemen who appeared before the committee are entirely sound. I think that if the Government desires to assist the manufacturers who need these metals, it has already the authority to stimulate their production and to encourage their being taken out of the ground. But I do not believe we ought to appropriate the sum of $50,000,000, as a revolving fund, to enter upon this line of activity. I do not know, but perhaps this may be the forerunner of bringing in a bill to stimulate and encourage the production of one other, and I assume now that there is probably only one other great commodity or great product which is necessary for the prosecution of the war that up to this time has been left untouched, and possibly when this measure is out of the way there will be a measure brought in here providing for a revolving fund of $50,000,000 or $500,000,000 to fix and guarantee the price of cotton. But as I said at the beginning, I believe that the results attained under the guaranteed price-fixing scheme is hardly such as to warrant us in continuing it by the passage of this measure.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, it may be true that gentlemen on the floor who possibly know but little about minerals and their uses may know more than those who direct their production and know what is necessary to be done to get them and how urgent it is now that the Government should be assured of a supply. I doubt they have all the wisdom.

The ships have been taken off and the imports have been reduced to 10 per cent of normal. It may be that they know better than the men who are looking after the imports, and it may be that existing legislation is sufficient, but I doubt it. Yet I expect they would be among the first to get up here and find fault that the department had exceeded its authority. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will yield, there is a difference between the Bureau of Mines having the power and the Government having the power.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH), there were—ayes 30, noes 15.

The SPEAKER. The rule is agreed to, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 11259, to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the terms of the rule the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will control one hour of the time, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] one hour.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I shall take but little time to talk about this bill. The committee having had its attention called to these minerals and the scarcity of them, and what was likely to occur if we did not make some provision for the future, took up this bill, which was first written in the department under Secretary Lane and the war minerals committee. I was consulted quite a number of times in reference to it, and it was changed quite a good deal, and then, as stated in the report, the bill was introduced as a committee print and the hearings were had upon that bill. Then, at the close of the hearings, the chairman was authorized to introduce the bill and to report it favorably to the House. It bears the favorable report of the Committee on Mines and Mining, except that possibly one or two members may desire to offer amendments, which they are at liberty to do. As to the principle of the bill, the whole committee are in favor of it. I will say that we had before the committee Secretary Lane; Dr. George Otis Smith, Director of the Geological Survey; Mr. Baruch of the war minerals committee; Mr. Pope Yeatman, who is connected with the war minerals committee; Mr. Stoughton; and some mining engineers throughout the country and State geologists. They went pretty thoroughly into this bill and its provisions, having had something to do, of course, with its preparation, and Secretary Lane, Mr. Baruch, Mr. Pope Yeatman, and these men urged that this bill become a law at the earliest possible date.

Secretary Lane says that this condition is becoming critical and that something should be done to relieve it. We must have these minerals if we expect to carry on this war. As has been said, we get our manganese largely from Brazil. The consumption this year will be 800,000 tons, and we have in sight in this country now, with the estimated production of the year 1918, 240,000 tons. As everyone who has studied this question knows, we must have pyrites. We need now between 8,000,000 and 9,000,000 tons of sulphuric acid. We need the pyrites in order that we may continue to make our sulphuric acid. Manganese must be provided if we are to continue to make our shells. We must have graphite, arsenic, platinum, and a number of others. Yet the quantity in this country, so far as known, is very small of many of them.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if, in mentioning these various minerals, he would briefly give us an idea of the uses to which they are put.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not want to take up the time to do that. I will be very glad to put it into the RECORD, so that the gentleman can see it. Now, I will take up pyrites.

Mr. JUUL. On page 2 of the bill you start with antimony.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the gentleman from Arkansas knows more about antimony, possibly, than some of the rest of us. These are the facts about pyrites:

PYRITES.

Name: (Synonyms: Pyrite, pyrrhotite, fool's gold, marcasite, coal brasses, iron pyrites, white iron pyrites, sulphur balls.)

Principal uses: Nonmilitary—For the manufacture of sulphuric acid, the larger part of which in normal times is consumed in the fertilizer industry. Military—Manufacture of sulphuric acid for use in munitions plants.

Degree of independence: In 1917, production, 33; consumption, 100.

Need for Government control: To encourage development of domestic deposits of pyrite and of the substitute mineral pyrrhotite, particularly those near points of consumption. To effect an adjustment between pyrite and sulphur used in various plants so as to insure maximum economy.

Principal domestic sources: The principal producing deposits are located in Virginia, California, Georgia, New York, Alabama, Missouri; in the coal regions of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Pennsylvania, and in the zinc-lead district of Wisconsin. Large unworked deposits occur in all the Rocky Mountain States; in Maine, and in North Carolina and South Carolina. Minor pyrite deposits occur in practically all the States of the Union.

Now, take manganese. I suppose that most people know the use of manganese.

Mr. HELM. Can the gentleman give us the price of that mineral in different years and the present price?

Mr. FOSTER. The price of manganese in 1908 was $12.74 a ton; in 1917, $26.95 a ton; and it is now $58.80.

Mr. HELM. Is not that price a sufficient stimulus to production?

Mr. FOSTER. If men had the money to go into these little mines, but they have not; and we must do something to stabilize the price, because when the war is over these prices will immediately drop down, and for fear that the war may end suddenly, men will not put a lot of money into the production; but if they can be assured a reasonable price, sufficient to pay them a profit, then they are willing to put their money into it.

Mr. JUUL. In other words, the gentleman means to state that when the war is over and no further use is found for the production of war materials, then the price will drop.

Mr. FOSTER. Why certainly, the price will naturally go down when there is no use for the material.

Mr. JUUL. Would they not get the normal price that existed before?

Mr. FOSTER. They would, but they would not get the price that they get now, and they could not compete with the cheaper production abroad.

Mr. HELM. Can the gentleman give the committee an idea of the number of mines that have been started since the war?

Mr. FOSTER. I can not. Some have been closed since the war began.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. I do not understand why the purpose of this bill could not be attained by the imposition of a high tariff.

Mr. FOSTER. How are you going to get the ships?

Mr. PLATT. After the war when the shipping would be plenty. You are trying to get the Government to guarantee the price after the war is over, so that the people will put their money into it. That is what the report says.

Mr. FOSTER. You can not get it in time if you had a tariff as high as the Dome of the Capitol.

Now, manganese it used to manufacture ferromanganese and dry batteries. Every ton of steel requires 14 to 15 pounds of manganese. Manganese steel contains 12 per cent of manganese and has some military application. The production in 1917 was 32 per cent out of 100 per cent.

This is a necessity for Government control to stimulate and develop the domestic supply and encourage the substitution of spiegeleisen in the production of manganese. The sources in this country are not large. It oftentimes appears in small pockets, but when you take it out of one pocket you are gone. This is the discouraging thing in regard to manganese.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Why is the sea salt included in the bill and what use will it be put to?

Mr. FOSTER. Sea salt is imported into this country and is used in New England for salting fish. They do not have salt in this country, especially on the Atlantic coast, that they can use for salting the fish. So they must get it across the water. On the Pacific coast I understand that they do use more native salt. I do not know whether I ought to go through all of this.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman would be safe in stating that about half of the materials are for the purpose of hardening steel and are absolutely necessary in the manufacture of engines, and so forth.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; there is no question about it. Take, for instance, arsenic, which is in the bill. Mr. Hoover told us he found arsenic had gone up from 4 cents a pound to 18 cents a pound, and, as we all know, arsenic is a very essential insecticide. He said that he had no power, in his judgment, to control the price of arsenic, except to contend that it was necessary for the growing of crops, and he took charge of all the arsenic in the United States and fixed the price at 8 cents a pound instead of 18 cents a pound.

The production in this country is about 6,000 tons of arsenic, which is about 60 per cent of the normal consumption in the United States. So we are short 4,000 tons. We ought to have some means of securing this mineral, which comes largely from copper mines. So if properly located we could probably secure the extra 4,000 tons.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Referring to manganese, we have not been producing much of that prior to 1914.

Mr. FOSTER. About 5,000 tons.

Mr. FESS. What is our capacity of consumption?

Mr. FOSTER. Secretary Lane says 120,000 tons last year, and we will probably double it, so that all we can see in 1918 is 240,000 tons when we require 800,000 tons. Before the war we produced 5,000 tons.

Mr. FESS. Dr. Smith states that at the present time we are mining more high-grade manganese, nearly twice as much in a single week as we did in a whole year in 1914.

I read from the hearings:

Mr. HAMLIN. How is the production of this metal as compared with our needs? Are we keeping pace with our needs?

Mr. SMITH. Last year we produced something like 23 per cent of our needs; we are doing much better than that now, but that seems to be a fair expression of the extent to which we are meeting our requirements.

The CHAIRMAN. So we are importing about 75 per cent?

Mr. SMITH. In one form or another. That was for 1917. I would not say what we are producing now.

Mr. WHITE. Of the high-grade ore we imported last year at least five-sixths, producing about 100,000 tons and importing about 750,000.

So it is the general opinion that under the aid which this bill will give we can produce our needs.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what we hope to do. I will say this to the gentleman from Ohio, that the manganese produced in this country is not of that high grade that is produced in Brazil. But here is the advantage the Government would have in securing the control of all that we do produce and import. If the Government had control of all the manganese imported from Brazil, which is of a high grade, it can be used in connection with that which is produced in this country, which metal men call a sort of sweetening, and in that way we could do very much better.

Mr. FESS. Where does our main supply come from, Brazil?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. But the lack of ships is the trouble.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; and so in the lack of pyrites from Spain.

Mr. STEENERSON. What is pyrites worth?

Mr. FOSTER. Twenty-six dollars a ton now.

Mr. FESS. I am rather sensitive on the subject touched upon by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. I would not be inclined to support this bill unless I thought it was an emergency. But I am convinced by Dr. Smith, whom I regard as one of the best posted men in America, that this bill is really needed.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say that I do not know much about this myself; I am a good deal in the situation of the gentleman from Ohio.

But I take the men who have been skilled in this work for years, men like Dr. Smith; like Mr. Bastin, who is in the Geological Survey; Mr. White—men of that kind—men like Mr. Lieth, of the Shipping Board, and Dr. Manning, and the men who are associated with him.

Mr. FESS. What about the American engineers?

Mr. FOSTER. The American engineers did this. They had a meeting in New York in which there were 14 directors present. They took up the bill one afternoon and did not think much of it. They went home that night and discussed it at their hotels, and the next morning they came back and all of them voted for it except two.

Mr. FESS. That is very suggestive.

Mr. FOSTER. Further, the State geologists in the United States are for it. They have passed resolutions to that effect, as the gentleman will see in the hearings. We had Dr. Richards, from the Lehigh University, and probably some of you know him—a most excellent gentleman, a man who impresses you with being honest and straightforward and who knows his business—and he urged very strongly that this bill should become a law, and he made some valuable suggestions to the committee in respect to these intermediate metallurgical substances.

Mr. FESS. I have had some correspondence with the head of the geological work in Ohio, Dr. Bonacher, and he very strongly urges this. For these reasons I shall support the measure, although naturally I would hesitate to support a bill of this kind, but these men think that the times demand it.

Mr. FOSTER. The men who have to look after getting these war materials are the ones who are held responsible for securing the proper amount, and they say it is absolutely necessary that we should do something, that a crisis is likely to be upon us when we will not have these materials.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Of course I think most of the Members of the House feel the same way as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], but the revolving fund of $50,000,000 seems to be a very large amount. I would like to have the gentleman, if he will tell us, state just about why he thinks that such an amount is necessary, and before the gentleman does that let me suggest this: It is now within the power of the Government, or at least would be by the other terms of this bill, to guarantee to any institution or to any corporation that would undertake, for instance, the development of manganese or the production of sulphuric acid or arsenic or any other war necessity for a certain length of time a certain profitable price. That could be done without any expenditure on the part of the Government, because we make appropriations for the purchase of these things.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. We must have the right if we control them. Take, for instance, imports. When the imports come into the United States, if it is necessary for the Government to control them, the Government must pay for them and then distribute them among the different manufacturers. We have to do that, I will say to the gentleman, and so it is if we go out and say to a man, "You get us so many tons of pyrites, and we will give you so much money for it if it is of a certain grade."

Mr. TOWNER. That is true; but let me suggest this to the gentleman. It may be that it is necessary to have this revolving fund, but it seems to me, in the first place, that perhaps it is altogether too large, and for this reason: Suppose it should be necessary that we should make appropriation for the purchase of all of the imports that shall come, we can do that in the ordinary way. It is not necessary for us to create a great revolving fund of $50,000,000, which is a temptation, as the gentleman well knows, for Government experts and enthusiasts to go out and say they will do this, that, or the other to develop all of these things. If we can secure that by private enterprise by making it profitable to private enterprise without this, it seems to me we ought to do it.

Mr. FOSTER. This accomplishes that purpose. I think it does. I do not know what amount they will need, I will say very frankly to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. I was going to ask whether the hearings throw any light on the amount of money that might be necessary.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know. We had talked about this, but I do not know whether it is in the hearings.

Mr. LONDON. I understand that Mr. Baruch made a statement that it would be necessary to appropriate a great deal more than $50,000,000; that it was a mere guess; that it was impossible at this moment to tell how much money would be necessary.

Mr. TOWNER. Why, certainly. We would have to appropriate perhaps more than $50,000,000 for the purchase of these articles; but that is not the proposition. We do that by appropriations, and can do it in that way as needed. But here is a proposition to create a revolving fund of $50,000,000, which is to be put into the hands of Government officials to use practically as they desire. It occurs to me that that is a dangerous proposition unless it is necessary. If it is necessary, we will all be for it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 20 minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I observe that the gentleman has enumerated platinum in his list of metals. I agree with the gentleman that the platinum situation is one of the most serious of all, but I am afraid the gentleman has not the right solution of the platinum question.

The great reason for the lack of platinum for the purpose of making war materials is its demand for jewelry purposes, and it is the demand for jewelry purposes, largely on the part of the women of the country, that has made the price of platinum near ten times that of gold. The gentleman may recall I endeavored to remedy the situation in one of the recent revenue laws by putting a prohibitive tax on the use of platinum for the making of jewelry.

Mr. FOSTER. I remember that.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Unfortunately, we did not pass it through the House.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a provision in this bill that gives the Government the right to prohibit its use for that purpose. It is a general provision.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not see that.

Mr. STEENERSON. It does not cover platinum.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is mistaken, I think.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That might solve the situation.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. FOSTER. I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. JUUL. I am asking in all sincerity—I want to say to the gentleman that I feel very friendly to the bill, but I would like to know what I am voting for.

Mr. FOSTER. Go ahead.

Mr. JUUL. Would this bill give the Government or a branch of the Government of the United States the power to negotiate or fix the price for a limited or unlimited period of time outside of the United States?

Mr. FOSTER. No; it only applies to the United States and possessions. It specifically says it shall not apply except to the United States.

Mr. JUUL. I am obliged to the gentleman for answering that. I was getting to be nervous that you might go over and start something somewhere else outside of the confines of this country and agree to have a year or two to pay prices that the value of the merchandise would not warrant.

Mr. FOSTER. No; it does not permit that. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. What section of the bill covers the subject of platinum?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not recall at the moment.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, in the hearings on this bill we had a great many people who came before us, and from the discussion given there, and given very earnestly and with whatever proof we could ask them, they insisted this bill was necessary for the prosecution of the war. Every item in here takes its place in some manner in contributing to the success of the war. A vast number of these metals go into the make-up of steel and iron of different qualities and different kinds that are necessary, and not alone necessary for us to have in this country but that we must furnish some of those to our allies who can not secure the same, and that this is the place from which we can secure these metals that they may need, and the evidence shown there in that committee convinced us that it was just as necessary to pass a bill of this character to develop these industries as it is to develop steel ore from the Mesaba Range that goes into the steel to be used in the making of battleships.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. How did the committee come to arrive at the figures $50,000,000 with which to start this enterprise?

Mr. GARLAND. Well, they did not arrive at that particular amount except that after consideration they believed that it might take that much. They do not expect to use that much unless it is absolutely necessary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, the gentleman, I am happy to say, has a good voice as well as a pleasing personality generally, and he can be heard, which is something I could not say of preceding speakers on the bill. They may have had something very important to say, and I want to get these facts, and I know the gentleman is able to let us have them. Fifty million dollars seems to be the sum now with which every committee starts some new enterprise in this country.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Nothing less.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I was wondering whether this was simply a force of habit that induced the Committee on Mines and its distinguished chairman to ask for that amount of money—whether it is the stereotyped amount or whether there is some real reason for it?

Mr. GARLAND. Oh, no; I think it is just a guess, as being the amount that may be necessary. None may be used.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Baruch was before the committee—the gentleman who now heads the World's War Board. Did he suggest $50,000,000?

Mr. GARLAND. He suggested $150,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. More than the committee agreed to?

Mr. GARLAND. One hundred and fifty million dollars was the total he suggested.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Hoover, the world's expert on food, was before the committee. Did he suggest any amount that they should start with?

Mr. GARLAND. He said this amount would be sufficient.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That $50,000,000 would be sufficient?

Mr. GARLAND. As I remember.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Several members of several other boards we have recently created here for war purposes were before the committee, as I overheard the gentleman from Illinois say a while ago. Did they come to any agreement as to the amount suggested?

Mr. GARLAND. I think they agreed that $50,000,000 would be sufficient, but that it was necessary to provide that amount in order to guarantee a supply of the different metals.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Leith, of the Shipping Board, was also before the committee. Did he have any suggestion as to the amount?

Mr. GARLAND. He seemed to agree to that too.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That that same amount would be satisfactory to him? Of course, I do not want to embarrass my friend from Pennsylvania, because he has worked hard on this bill. He is a practical man and knows something about what taxpayers have to meet in the way of war expenditures, and I want to ask him whether in his judgment we might not cut down this amount and start on something a little more reasonable?

Mr. GARLAND. I am for the amount in the bill for the reason that it appears to be sufficient to start on properly, and we will not necessarily have to come back after we have begun to prosecute the work and that we could deliver these minerals in a manner that will insure enough for the carrying on of the war.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It would not cover coal mines?

Mr. GARLAND. It does not. They stipulate here all the minerals that are intended to be covered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The articles are all enumerated. The report indicates, and I assume the report was written by a very good Democrat, probably the chairman of the committee, that the purpose of the appropriation of $50,000,000 out of the Treasury is to stimulate home industries.

Mr. GARLAND. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is a pretty good tariff man, or was in prewar times, and I want to ask him whether he thinks it is altogether fair to the great Republican Party in these war times that the Democratic Party should come in here with a proposition to take money out of the Treasury of the United States rather than to have a protective tariff to stimulate home industries?

Mr. GARLAND. I will say this: That I recognize, and we all do at this time, that these infant industries were neglected at the time the tariffs were put on, and in a time of peace. There is no question about that. These industries were neglected. They were not protected, and as a consequence were not developed. Now, we have a war and we need these metals, and must have them, and the Government steps in and takes the place of the protection by paying for it out of the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of the United States?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And therefore the people pay for the stimulation of their own industries?

Mr. GARLAND. I see no other side to it but that.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. I will.

Mr. FESS. In the discussion of the Underwood bill in 1913 there was an effort to put a protective tariff upon ferromanganese in order to stimulate its production. It was very largely ridiculed out of court when the effort was made, and if the gentleman will recall, just a few moments ago, when I questioned the distinguished chairman of this committee, the Democratic Member from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], as to whether he expected under this bill to produce sufficient manganese to satisfy the country, he felt sure that we would do it.

Mr. GARLAND. I was not here in that Congress.

Mr. FESS. Which was virtually a concession that had we stimulated it under the law of 1913 we would not be in this situation to-day.

Mr. GARLAND. I think it is only fair to say that I think we are warranted in attempting to do this, but that every one of these industries would have been developed if they had been properly safeguarded by a tariff, with the exception, possibly, of two.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think that if we had adopted a ship-subsidy law a few years ago it might not have been necessary to create the Shipping Board during the duration of the war?

Mr. GARLAND. I unquestionably do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So that gentlemen are coming in under the cover of war now to protect themselves in times of peace.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman from Ohio brought up the Underwood tariff law. Does the gentleman think it is absolutely necessary to bring up painful recollections of that kind?

Mr. GARLAND. It is not painful to me; I had no part in it.

Mr. SLOAN. Except in recollection of the Underwood tariff. If the bitter cup must be taken, we must refer to it; but I thought the painful recollection of that distinguished piece of legislation would not be thrust upon the House.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I think my friend from Nebraska will agree with me, in view of the shortsightedness of our Democratic friends in 1913, we will not stand in the way now of developing things by governmental agencies that we might have developed by individual initiative if they had been a little more farsighted and had listened to the Republican Members at that time. In other words, we will not throw a stumbling block in the way now.

Mr. GARLAND. That is pure Republican spirit.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. I will.

Mr. JUUL. Is there any clause in this bill anywhere that puts a limitation on the amount which may be used out of this $50,000,000 to pay employees? I find on page 3, line 6, that "Any person may be employed under the provisions of this act without reference to civil-service laws and regulations." Now, does the gentleman consider that a good clause in a bill of this kind?

Mr. GARLAND. I am not very much in favor of that clause, but still I am in favor of the bill as it is, although we may amend it in some places.

Mr. JUUL. Was there any necessity for incorporating that in the bill?

Mr. GARLAND. It was done in order that to get employees that understood the business we could take practical people. We might not be able to get them through the civil service.

Mr. JUUL. Could not they be examined with the object in view of examining them simply as to their qualifications as mineralogists?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. Would not this practically open the door to the unlimited expenditure of money? I am not speaking in a spirit of criticism.

Mr. GARLAND. It is supposed to be necessary to employ such people as may be necessary to perform work of this kind. This is for the purpose of encouraging those industries and opening them up. In other words, it has come to a point where we must have these metals. We can not import them any longer, at least in any great quantity.

Mr. JUUL. But the gentleman does not indorse particularly those three lines—6, 7, and 8, on page 3—to which I have referred?

Mr. GARLAND. I will say that the bill is subject to amendment.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this bill authorizes any surveys for the purpose of locating deposits of minerals in the ground? Whether that is authorized under section 12 or any other section of the bill?

Mr. GARLAND. Wherever the Government finds there are unused grounds or mines not being operated, it has the right to go in and operate them. But the principal intention of this bill is to encourage those who have such mines or deposits on their lands to develop them. Now, for instance, as to the sulphur mentioned in here; in Pennsylvania and in other States where there is coal there is more or less of sulphur. In some places the coal is so full of sulphur it is necessary to wash it before they use it for coking purposes and purposes of that kind. If there was sufficient price for the sulphur it could be recovered, and we are in hopes that by putting up appliances it will bring the sulphur to places where it could be used.

Mr. HUSTED. The reason I asked the question was this, that I know in the State of New York we have a very efficient geologist, and have had one for the past 40 years, and surveys of the whole State have been made for the purpose of locating mineral deposits. I assume the same is true of the other States of the Union.

Mr. GARLAND. Nearly all of them.

Mr. HUSTED. It seems to me the trouble lies in this indefinite future expenditure in the attempt to locate minerals. Is that authority contained in the act?

Mr. GARLAND. Most of the States have geological departments, and the representatives of those departments have an association of their own. They were represented at the hearings, and all agreed to work in harmony and do all they could to help develop these particular minerals.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will my colleague from Pennsylvania yield for one question? Does the gentleman know whether the President indorses this bill?

Mr. GARLAND. I have understood through the Secretary of the Interior that he does.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The chairman of the committee in his speech made no reference to the President having indorsed the measure. That would seem to be the rule, so far as the House is concerned, for determining the war necessity of a bill like this. It has been so before. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, whether the President of the United States has given any indication of his approval of this bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman that the President has not written to me about this bill, but I say that the President is for it. This is a war measure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman quoted some witnesses who were before his committee, but it has come to be the practice of the House this war session, when a bill involving $50,000,000 comes before the House, to have a letter from the President indorsing it as a war measure.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not want to bring up that matter. I did not mention that at all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Surely there would be no objection to bringing before the House the matter of the President's indorsement of a $50,000,000 bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Still trespassing on the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I would like to know if the President is for this bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is so obviously necessary that it is not necessary for the President to instruct the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am trespassing on the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND], who has been very generous so far.

Mr. GARLAND. I yield.

Mr. SLOAN. From the inquiries of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], as I understand the matter, under the Constitution there is just one way for the President to give his legislative advice to the House of Representatives or the Senate, and he is an adept at that, either orally or in writing; and if the President is in favor of any of these propositions, I assume that he will send a message in the usual way, in his splendid method of expressing himself, or will come before the Congress and advise it.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman knows that the Congress has conferred great power upon the President, and we welcome his advice and his suggestions as to the war necessity of these measures.

Mr. SLOAN. I certainly would welcome it, and would welcome it in the constitutional way.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought possibly the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], would have some information on this subject, being the spokesman of his party and bringing in a bill that is supposed to be and is represented to be a war measure. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GARLAND] for yielding to me under these conditions.

Mr. HELM. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, since the declaration of war there has been an enormous expansion of all characters and kinds of business relating to war preparation. New plants have been erected and plants existing before the war have been enlarged and multiplied. Nearly all of the plants demanding these metals that are enumerated in this bill are consuming them in far greater quantities than ever before, are they not?

Mr. GARLAND. I think they are.

Mr. HELM. Is there any testimony before the committee that any plant of any character or kind in the United States requiring any one of these metals as a constituent element in the manufacture of its products or output has been unable to secure sufficient quantities of raw material?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes; there has been. In the testimony it was shown that some of them were not able to get sufficient quantities of the different metals that they should have in order to turn out the full output of their establishments.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman kindly indicate what?

Mr. GARLAND. In addition to that, there has been an embargo on a great many of them, so that they can not be imported. For instance, take pyrites. We have plenty of pyrites in this country. We can get that substance almost anywhere in the country sufficient for all the needs of ourselves and our allies, but the price of it when shipped from Spain has been so low that it did not pay anybody to develop the mining of pyrites in this country. That industry now requires five ships to supply us.

Mr. HELM. Have we the raw material here?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes; but the mining of it has not been developed.

Mr. HELM. Are we getting it in sufficient quantities?

Mr. GARLAND. No; the price did not warrant people in going into that business. We are getting some.

Mr. GARNER. Could you not put an embargo on its importation?

Mr. GARLAND. There is an embargo. It comes from Spain. They are commandeering those ships, which they want to use in more necessary work.

Now, the purpose is to release these ships from that burden, allow them to take the boys and the supplies over there and develop these minerals right here where we have them.

Mr. HELM. What I am trying to get at is how is the volume of this business increased—the domestic production? Has it increased or not?

Mr. GARLAND. It has.

Mr. HELM. To what extent?

Mr. GARLAND. The production in this country is about 33 per cent of the consumption. In 1908 the production in long tons was 220,598. The price was $3.85. In 1917 the production was 462,662 tons, double the amount, and the price was $5.37 as against $3.85.

Mr. HELM. Has that tended to extend the production?

Mr. GARLAND. It has tended to increase the production and still we produce only 33 per cent at that.

Mr. HELM. Can the gentleman cite the committee to any other mineral?

Mr. GARLAND. Every article in here is in much the same situation. I can show you the evidence that was given. Take antimony. That is used with lead, 12½ per cent of antimony, for the purpose of making shrapnel bullets. Antimony sulphide is used in making bombs.

Mr. HELM. What I want to know is how far the supply is behind the demand.

Mr. GARLAND. The production is about 10 per cent of the consumption. The consumption is 100 per cent.

Mr. HELM. All consumption is on a basis of 100 per cent.

Mr. GARLAND. In some articles we get more than the amount used, but not sufficient to supply the allies.

Mr. HELM. Is this for home consumption, or are we undertaking to supply all of the belligerent countries with which we are associated in the war?

Mr. GARLAND. Only so far as the prosecution of the war goes.

Mr. HELM. How does it meet the demand in the United States?

Mr. GARLAND. As I say, we only produced in 1910 33 per cent.

Mr. HELM. You say that this supply is needed for the allies?

Mr. GARLAND. I say in regard to some of these metals we have produced nearly the amount that we use. I can not now recall which ones, but I believe there are only a few.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. The evidence before the committee was that there are ample supplies of the various minerals in this country?

Mr. GARLAND. In nearly all instances, with the exception of two.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Are the sources of these minerals known to the Government?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes; they have evidence of it in different States and different places.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Then there is not much need of prospecting for the location of the minerals.

Mr. GARLAND. I would not say that the bill contemplates much prospecting. It is known to a more or less extent where the minerals are, but the appliances to get out the quantity required requires some capital, and if men will develop them the bill is for the purpose of warranting the people who do develop them that they will get their money back by the price received.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. In other words, it is a guarantee of a minimum price.

Mr. GARLAND. It is a guarantee to an infant industry.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Do I understand that if a company of men will associate themselves together and indicate that they have minerals of some kind, the Government will back the enterprise?

Mr. GARLAND. No; not back the enterprise, but encourage them and see to it that we will pay a price sufficient to warrant them in putting in the required machinery to develop the mine and get out the mineral. The Government must at all times be able to discover how much it costs. In fact, the bill contemplates that the employees in that work who have it improved may examine the books and know the amount of cost, and it is to warrant the holders of such properties in putting in their own money to develop that industry.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Department of the Interior issues licenses to the owners of the mines or mining property with a view to having development take place.

Mr. GARLAND. This contemplates licenses.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Government does not take the property over, but licenses the owner of such company as might be formed, following the suggestion of my colleague from Kentucky, and then they get a Government guaranty on what is produced.

Mr. GARLAND. The license is for the purpose of enabling the Government, if they try profiteering and do not live up to the regulations of the Government, to take away the license and the parties shall not produce the article any longer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Government has the power to destroy the market for it by boycotting it.

Mr. GARLAND. The Government reserves the right to say whether they shall continue if they do not play fair.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is there anything in the bill that contemplates the development of any mine on property owned by the Government—the public land?

Mr. GARLAND. There is a provision for the Government taking over idle or unused mines.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman misunderstands the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. I think the gentleman's inquiry goes to mines on Government land.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GARLAND. That is what I am speaking of. I was speaking of mines on Government land. Some individual claims the land; but in order to get his patent he has to go through certain mining work, and if he does not do that the Government can take it over. This enables the Government to take it and operate it.

Mr. FESS. Is there anything in the bill that authorizes the Government to develop its own mines?

Mr. HAMLIN. No.

Mr. GARLAND. No; that is not contemplated.

Mr. FESS. In other words, the bill contemplates simply buying the products of American miners out of American mines rather than going to Spain and elsewhere to buy it.

Mr. GARLAND. Yes. They can not longer get it from there. That is the trouble. We are forced to have this mineral, and this is a means of getting it, and we believe an effective means, and while we are doing that we are developing our own resources.

Mr. FESS. Buying it of our own people?

Mr. GARLAND. Yes.

Mr. FESS. And fixing a price that would justify our own people in going ahead and developing the mines.

Mr. GARLAND. That is exactly it, and enabling them to put in the machinery necessary.

Mr. FESS. We have been a little disturbed about the $50,000,000. That seems to be a large sum; but if it must be used for the purchase of these materials it is better to buy them of our own people rather than if the markets were open to go into other countries and spend the money there.

Mr. GARLAND. Unquestionably. It can be used; maybe none of it will be used, but it is to encourage the people to go into that business. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], I shall yield myself some time. This bill is patterned very largely after what is known as the food-control bill. It is a character of legislation that under normal conditions and in normal times, I take it, none of us would favor. I would not, I am quite sure. Representatives of the Bureau of Mines, Geological Survey, together with a number of other people who are experts, mining engineers, and so forth, came before our committee and told us that the minerals mentioned in this bill are very scarce in this country, and yet vitally necessary in the manufacture of war materials, arms, and ammunition, and so forth, things that we must have and can not do without at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMLIN. In just a moment—and that as a matter of fact there were present in this country practically all of these minerals, if properly developed, but that a majority of them have so far been found in small quantities, not sufficient to supply the demand; but it was the opinion of geologists and others, before our committee, that if those owning the small mines could be encouraged to increase their production, then our domestic requirements might be supplied here at home. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman information as to where the different minerals proposed to be legislated for can be located?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Just let me ask a series of questions, and the gentleman can answer them later.

Mr. HAMLIN. Very well.

Mr. MADDEN. And the development thus far had in the respective minerals, the quantities being produced of each class to-day, the quantity that is needed for the war needs of the country, and whether they can all be obtained in the United States through private operations, assisted by the Government, or whether the Government itself is going into the mining business?

Mr. HAMLIN. Not at all.

Mr. MADDEN. And whether the $50,000,000 is necessary or only part of it is necessary; whether $10,000,000 would not do just as well; whether, after we have proved the inadequacy of a $10,000,000 appropriation, we could not obtain more if we needed it?

Mr. HAMLIN. I am afraid the gentleman's question will be so long that I will not be able to remember it all.

Mr. MADDEN. I am asking a lot of questions. Those are things I think the Members of the House would like to know.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am going to try to answer every one of those questions, provided I have the time.

Mr. MADDEN. We would like to get a succinct statement of the reasons for the legislation, showing what we hope to accomplish by it in detail and not in the aggregate.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, my time will be too limited, I am afraid, to answer all of the gentleman's questions; but, answering one of the questions, let us take the item of antimony, which is the first metal mentioned in the bill. We are producing now in this country only about 10 per cent of what we have to have. The military necessity for this metal is given in the brief as follows:

Is found in antimonial lead, which is about 10½ per cent antimony, used for shrapnel bullets; then we have need for antimony sulphide in certain smoke bombs and in shells and cartridges.

Mr. MADDEN. We are only producing about 10 per cent of our needs?

Mr. HAMLIN. In this country at this time; yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What can we produce, and how does the gentleman know we can produce more?

Mr. HAMLIN. That is, in a way, an unknown quantity; but down in the State of Arkansas there is a known antimony deposit. The Bureau of Mines has furnished us with this map, and the gentleman can get a pretty good idea of where the present deposits of ore mentioned in the bill have been located by the Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines prospectors, and so forth. Now, in Arkansas there is an antimony deposit which has been producing and is producing now, as I understand it. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], in whose district this deposit is located, can give more definite information about it.

Mr. MADDEN. Producing what?

Mr. HAMLIN. Antimony.

Mr. MADDEN. How much?

Mr. WINGO. It is not a question of an antimony mine, but there are vast antimony deposits there, and no one knows what they will produce until opened up fully.

Mr. MADDEN. What is it in, pockets? Do they have to drive a shaft?

Mr. WINGO. Yes; they have to drive a shaft.

Mr. MADDEN. Or a tunnel.

Mr. WINGO. They have to drive a shaft.

Mr. MADDEN. How deep from the surface is antimony found?

Mr. WINGO. I have been in one shaft at one time, and I think the deepest shaft had gone down about 200 feet, possibly.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the deposit, in a vein?

Mr. WINGO. It is not a vein at all.

Mr. MADDEN. It is in pockets?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. So when you get one pocket it may be 10 feet square, and that ends it and you do not know what is coming after that?

Mr. HAMLIN. My time is limited, and I can not yield further. Antimony is not only found in Arkansas but in Nevada, California, Alaska, Washington, Oregon, and Idaho.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman say it was found in Nevada?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes. It is found in Nevada, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and Arkansas.

Now, take the case of arsenic. We produce 60 per cent, or did in 1917, of the amount we required.

Mr. MADDEN. Where do we get the other 40 per cent?

Mr. HAMLIN. We imported it.

Mr. MADDEN. Where from?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will look. I wish I had more time; I have got it all here.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is important to get this into the RECORD and that we get this information from the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. I will say to the gentleman that before the day is over I intend to put in the RECORD the statistical information covering each and every one of these essential supplies we are importing and the domestic production, so it can be used when we get under the five-minute debate in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was going to do that same thing, but if the gentleman is prepared to do it I will be very glad to have him do so.

Mr. WINGO. I am prepared to do that.

Mr. HAMLIN. About 90 per cent of arsenic comes from Canada, where it is produced as a by-product in the smelting of silver ore at Cobalt, Ontario.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman stated a moment ago we produced 60 per cent. We only need 40 per cent more.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is the statement furnished by the Bureau of Mines, and no doubt what is meant is that 90 per cent of what is imported comes from Canada.

Mr. MADDEN. That is a friendly place and we can afford to continue that further.

Mr. HAMLIN. We could do that, but we may just as well produce it in this country and be self-sustaining. I would like to take time to endeavor to correct some false impressions which appear to prevail in regard to the purposes of this bill.

This bill simply seeks to give the Government a right to control, in so far as it can, the production and handling of certain scarce minerals and ores which are vitally necessary in the manufacture of war materials. I know that there is not a man here who is not more than willing to do everything necessary to back up our brave boys who have gone and who will go to the front to fight for the things for which we stand, and, if necessary, make the supreme sacrifice that the Stars and Stripes may continue to be emblematic of the freedom of mankind the world around. These brave boys must have arms and ammunition and other military equipments. It is up to us to provide them. These things can not be furnished without the use of the things mentioned in this bill. We can not get them from foreign countries without the use of ships. Ships can not be provided in sufficient numbers to properly transport our Army to France and to provide them with food and equipment. Especially is this true if some of the ships are to be used in the importation of material which may be produced in this country. This is a drastic measure, but these are drastic times and call for heroic remedies.

Now, what does this bill provide? Let us take a brief review of its provisions.

Section 1 enumerates certain scarce minerals and ores and by-products thereof, which the committee believes the Government, under present conditions, ought to control.

Section 2 provides that the President, through the Secretary of the Interior, may carry out the provisions of the bill.

Section 3 provides that no person who may be connected in any official or semiofficial way with the execution of this law shall profit by reason of any contract made with any concern with which he may have a business connection and which is in any way connected with the production or handling of the materials mentioned in this bill. And this provision is safeguarded by a severe penalty for violation of the same.

Section 4 prevents any person, company, firm, or corporation from committing waste, hoarding, or in any manner prevent a full, free, and equitable distribution of the materials mentioned in the first section of this bill.

Section 5 provides for the licensing, when deemed necessary, of persons, firms, companies, or corporations engaged in the production, storing, transporting, or otherwise handling any materials mentioned herein. The purpose for this provision is apparent. The Government must have some direct and effective way to enforce the provisions of this bill.

Section 6 is a definitive section.

Section 7 provides for a mode of procedure in case the provisions of section 6 shall be violated.

Section 8 provides for punishment of any person, firm, company, or corporation who shall attempt to enhance the value or restrict the output or in any other way improperly attempt to interfere with the Government control of the materials mentioned in the bill.

Section 9 prohibits the forming of conspiracies to do certain things contrary to the provisions of this bill.

Section 10 gives the President the right, under certain conditions, to requisition these necessaries, to store the same, and to pay certain compensation for private property taken or private rights invaded.

Section 11 gives the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, a right to use the funds provided or authorized in this bill, under certain limitations, to purchase, store, and sell the necessaries mentioned in section 1 of the bill.

Section 12 gives authority to the Government to requisition and take up certain undeveloped or insufficiently operated mines or idle mineral lands under certain conditions and limitations. The wisdom of this provision must be apparent to everyone who has a full appreciation of the critical situation that this Government may be put in as to these vital necessaries during the existence of this war.

Section 13 gives the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, a right to make such regulations as he may deem necessary to prevent an undue enhancement, depression, fluctuation in prices, speculations, and so forth, to the detriment or injury of the Government, and provides a right to organize the necessary machinery in the Department of the Interior to carry out the provisions of this bill.

Section 14 is perhaps the most important section in the bill. Among other things, it provides authority to the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, to fix, under certain conditions, both a minimum and maximum price for the materials mentioned in section 1 of the bill, and also gives him authority to purchase outright any materials mentioned herein, when in his judgment the interests of the Government may require him to do so. In order to protect the interest of the Government, he may adjust the tariff duties on the articles mentioned in the first section of this bill. In other words, I think this section will give the President authority to absolutely control the price of these minerals and also a right to protect the interest of the Government on any guaranties made, and to insure a proper and equitable distribution of these necessaries by resale, in such manner as he may deem best.

The other sections of the bill are largely administrative and provide a revolving fund to enable the President, through the Interior Department, to carry out and enforce the provisions and purposes of the bill.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. I will.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Who prepared that map?

Mr. HAMLIN. This map was prepared down at the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. In the discussion, will the gentleman go into the approximate percentage of the details of the production? You have bromine there——

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] has just stated that he will put in the RECORD of to-day all of that information, so that the gentlemen can read it in the RECORD to-morrow.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Just a second——

Mr. HAMLIN. I will not have time to go into that.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. The purpose of this bill, I understand, was to stimulate production.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; and to prevent hoarding, profiteering, and secure proper distribution of these vital minerals and ores.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Will the gentleman advise me whether or not a revolving fund of $10,000,000 instead of $50,000,000 will suffice as well as the amount fixed?

Mr. HAMLIN. It may. I am not in any way wedded to the idea of $50,000,000. There may be $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 required; I do not know. What we want to do is to furnish the President, or the Interior Department through the President, with a sufficient fund to carry out the purposes of this bill. I do not care, and I do not believe the committee cares, anything about what the specific sum is, so it is sufficient to do the work.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman has stated the Government does not intend to go into the mining business.

Mr. HAMLIN. It does not.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the reason for the provision of section 12, which provides that the Government may requisition and take over for use or operation by the Government any undeveloped or insufficiently developed or operated or idle mineral land or deposits, and so forth?

Mr. HAMLIN. It is just one of those precautionary provisions put in to meet a condition or emergency which we do not believe will but may arise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. I yield myself five minutes more.

TAKE UP THE SHIPPING SITUATION.

Now, then, what we are seeking to do is to be able to say to the people, who are putting their money into the development of these mines, we will guarantee that you shall receive not less than a certain price per pound or per ton, whatever the unit is, for the ore that you produce within a given period of time, and that price will be such as to insure a return of their invested capital. We recognize that these are extraordinary times; that the demands are extraordinary; and that a tariff would not be able to control the situation because too slow and uncertain. These are extraordinary times, where an extraordinary amount of an extraordinary kind of material is needed, and extraordinary means must be adopted to meet the situation. Men in normal times can not afford to mine low-grade ore and compete with mines where the recovery may be large, but we need in this emergency the products of all kinds of mines producing the minerals mentioned in this bill. We need sulphur, and large quantities of it can be gotten out of coal, but it requires the installation of a certain kind of machinery and plant to do that.

In normal times the demand for sulphur would not be sufficient to warrant the expense of putting in these plants. Now, then, we need the sulphur, and so we say to the coal producers, "Put in your plant and produce or separate from the coal the sulphur that the manufacturers need, and we will guarantee for a certain period of time that your prices shall not fall below a certain price." In this way we hope to stimulate the production of these rare and scarce minerals, much of which are now being imported from foreign countries, and which we can not continue to import if we are to use the ships in other lines which are so vitally necessary at this time.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This bill refers not only to these rare minerals of which the gentleman has spoken, but also to "ores, minerals, intermediate metallurgical products, metals, alloys, and chemical compounds."

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does not the gentleman think that the term "chemical compounds" is perhaps a little too broad? For instance, let me draw the attention of the gentleman to pyrites, which is the basis of sulphuric acid, and sulphuric acid is the basis of many thousands of acids, many of which have no relation to the war. With the general, broad term of "chemical compounds," do we propose to give the right to the Government to regulate the price of all of these?

Mr. HAMLIN. That was discussed in the committee. I confess that I do not possess the technical training along those lines to have an opinion of my own. The original bill did not contain the language to which the gentleman has just directed attention, but experts from the Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey and others came before our committee and said that there would be some question, perhaps, whether certain of these vital by-products or compounds would be controlled if the language should be left as it is in the first draft of the bill, and they suggested the language which the gentleman from Ohio has just read, and it was put in the bill.

Now, then, speaking for myself, this thought occurred to me, and I think it will occur to the gentleman from Ohio: This bill, by terms, is only effective during the war. We are hoping that the period is not to be long. There would not be much time, we hope, for an abuse if that provision of the bill is too broad and advantage should be sought under it. There might be times when it would be necessary for the Government to have these broad privileges, and I for one would be in favor of including too broad language in the bill rather than making it too narrow and finding ourselves embarrassed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would not like to offer any obstacles to the production of these variously named metals, but when you use the term "chemical compounds," and when I happen to know vaguely that sulphuric acid is the basis of almost every acid that is made, and that we now give the right to regulate the price of every acid produced in this country, it seems to me that is much too broad, and I think the committee would have been wise if they had left the bill as it was originally.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me offer an explanation. I think the gentleman is not perhaps justified in his suspicion, because of this fact, and if you notice the language it says it includes only the following-named mineral substances. Now, that limits the consideration of this bill or the application of it to the list of articles commencing with antimony. Some of them, as the gentleman will see, are minerals and some of them are ores. So that general language does not include everything.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I do not make any pretension to any technical knowledge of these minerals or chemical propositions. For that very reason very early in the consideration of this bill I called on the department for a statistical statement that would give certain information; that is, give the name of each one of these ores, its principal uses for domestic as well as for military purposes, and then the extent of our dependence on them; that is, the domestic production as compared to the total consumption, and then the need for Government control as asked for by the department, and the principal domestic sources or foreign sources, and amount of imports. Now, I have had that furnished by the department, and I will ask at this time unanimous consent to insert that in the RECORD so that when we get under the five-minute rule gentlemen can very promptly turn to the RECORD and get this information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the data to which he has referred. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ANTIMONY.

Principal ore mineral stibnite, a sulphide of antimony. Some oxides of antimony also mined.

Principal uses: Nonmilitary—Alloyed with lead and other metals for type metal, antifriction bearings for machinery, etc.; white antimony oxides for enameling bathtubs, etc.; also in glass making; red antimony sulphides for vulcanizing and coloring red rubber; also in paints. Military—Antimonial lead with about 12½ per cent antimony for shrapnel bullets; antimony sulphide in certain smoke bombs; antimony sulphide in primers of shells and cartridges.

Extent of independence: In 1917, production about 10; consumption, 100.

Need for Government control: Stimulation of domestic production will be necessary in event of curtailment or complete cutting off of over-seas imports.

Principal domestic sources (arranged in order of their 1916 production):

Nevada: Mainly Humboldt, Lander, and Elko Counties.
California: Mainly Kern and Inyo Counties.
Alaska: Fairbanks and Nome districts.
Washington: Mainly Okanogan County.
Oregon: Mainly from Baker County.
Idaho: Shoshone County.
Arkansas: Sevier County.

Domestic production: Antimony ore production negligible prior to 1915. No statistics.

ARSENIC.

Main oxide of arsenic, also known as white arsenic and arsenious acid.

Principal uses: Uses entirely industrial, about two-thirds going into insecticides and "weed killers" and one-third into the manufacture of glass.

Degree of independence: 1917, production, 60; consumption, 100.

Need for governmental control: In absence of mineral administrator, Food Administration has had to control arsenic situation to maintain reasonable prices for a substance essential to crop growing. Production in hands of a few large companies. A careful consideration of further needs is essential with a view to securing increased production as required.

Principal domestic sources: The arsenic produced in the United States is almost entirely a smelter by-product. The ores yielding the arsenic are widely distributed, but Butte, Mont., is probably the principal camp.

BALL CLAY, OR WHITE-BURNING PLASTIC CLAY.

Principal uses: Pottery, including porcelain electrical supplies.

Need for Government control: To encourage development of domestic deposits and improve methods of mining and concentration. To allocate imports to industries in which they are most essential.

Principal domestic sources: Major—Florida, Kentucky, Tennessee. Minor—California, New Jersey.

Imports: Imports of this type of clay not separately reported. Practically all comes from England. Imported ball clays superior to and more uniform than most domestic ball clays.

BISMUTH.

Principal uses: Industrial—For low-melting-point alloys in automatic-sprinkler systems, boiler safety plugs, etc.; also some bearing metals and type metals. Bismuth salts are used in medicine for intestinal disorders. Military—Bismuth salts in surgical dressings.

Need for Government control: The large use in surgical dressings makes it essential to provide in advance for adequate supplies. Large amounts now going to waste in smelter furnaces could be conserved.

Domestic production and prices: Bismuth is a by-product of lead and, to a small extent, of copper refining. Production statistics are not available. No unusual demand has developed during the war period, and the price has remained at about $3.50 per pound.

BROMINE.

Principal uses: Nonmilitary—Photography, medicine, and chemistry. Military—Asphyxiating gas and medicine.

Degree of independence: Undeveloped domestic supplies are adequate for all demands.

Need for Government control: Military needs far exceed present rate of production, and wells are now being drilled at Government expense to increase the output. The careful use of the existing supply and the stimulation of further production would be facilitated by a mineral administration.

Principal domestic sources: A by-product of the salt industry obtained from salt wells in Michigan, Ohio, and West Virginia.

CERIUM AND THORIUM (ORE MINERAL, CHIEFLY MONAZITE).

The oxide of cerium or ceria constitutes about one-third of the mineral monazite. The oxide of thorium constitutes a variable but less quantity of the same mineral. The mineral monazite is mined for its thorium content chiefly. Cerium is obtained as a by-product in the extraction of thorium.

Principal uses: Cerium: Industrial—Incandescent gas mantles, constituent of spark-producing alloys for cigar lighters, etc. Military—Suggested uses—ignition of explosives; for military signaling. Thorium: Industrial—Incandescent gas mantles. Military—None known.

Degree of independence: Production, less than 1; consumption, 100.

Need for Government control: To encourage discovery and development of domestic deposits to insure control in case important military uses develop.

Principal domestic sources: Stream sands in North and South Carolina.

CHALK, CLIFFSTONE, WHITING (CRUDE).

Principal uses: Used as filler in manufacture of rubber. Used in paint, and putty, and for polishing paper.

Degree of independence, 1917: Production, 8; consumption, 100.

Need for Government control: To aid in development of domestic substitutes, to restrict consumption of high-grade imported material to important uses, and to secure its just allocation.

Principal domestic sources: No true chalk is obtained in the United States. Limestones yielding substitutes for English whiting are quarried in Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, Iowa. CHROMIUM.

Principal ore mineral is chromite.

Principal uses: Nonmilitary—Making ferrochrome used in chrome steel, especially for automobiles; making refractory brick for blast furnaces; making chemicals for paints, dyes, leather tanning. Military—Making ferrochrome for steel used in armor plates, armor-piercing projectiles, high-speed steel-cutting tools, aeroplane motors, etc.

Degree of independence: 1917 production, 37; consumption, 100.

Need for Government control: To increase domestic production to permit further reduction of imports from New Caledonia. This can only be done by encouraging the small miner, for most of the deposits are small. The production of ferrochrome is mainly in the hands of one concern which controls also the chromite imports. Government control is desirable to forestall profiteering.

Principal domestic sources: Prime importance—Sierra Nevada Range in California, Coast Range in California, Klamath Mountains of California and Oregon, Blue Mountains of Oregon. Secondary importance—Washington, Wyoming, Pennsylvania, Maryland, North Carolina.

Degree of independence: 1917, production, 0; consumption, 100.

Need for Government control: To aid development of domestic sources and to secure just allocation of imports according to Government needs.

CORUNDUM AND EMERY.

Principal uses: Industrial—Grinding, roughdressing, shaping, and polishing metal, particularly steel and glass. Military—Used as above in manufacture of a host of articles, munitions, and general military equipment.

Degree of independence: Production, 83; consumption, 100.

This degree of independence is more apparent than real, inasmuch as domestic emery of inferior grade was necessarily employed at cost of speed and efficiency to supplant foreign emery normally, but not now imported in large quantities.

Need for Government control: To direct and assist search for domestic supplies and assist in development of them and distribution of the product, and to secure just allocation of imported high-grade materials necessary to industries engaged in production of military equipment.

Principal domestic sources: Major—New York, Westchester County; North Carolina, Jackson and Macon Counties; Virginia, Pittsylvania County. Minor—Georgia, Rabun County (nonproductive); Montana, Gallatin County.

EMERY.

FERROSILICON.

Alloy of iron and silicon.

Principal uses: To increase the liquidity in casting steel; to deoxidize steel; to make silicon pig iron or steel, which resist corrosive action of acids and are used in acid and chemical plants.

MOLYBDENUM.

Principal ore minerals, molybdenite and wulfenite.

Principal uses: The use in this country is small. About 15 to 20 tons of metal per year for making chemicals for the determination of phosphorous in steel, possibly 10 to 20 tons are used in steel and stellite making, but most of the molybdenum goes to Europe to be used as a substitute for part of the tungsten in high-speed tool steels. These uses have an important bearing upon the war because all apply to the steel trade. In France some molybdenum is used in making breech blocks for cannon.

Need for Government control: Molybdenum is a substitute for tungsten in steel for certain purposes. Though not now much used in the United States, it is exported for use by our allies and the industry in this country should be fostered. One ton of molybdenum replaces 2 tons of tungsten in steel manufacture.

Principal domestic sources: (a) Arizona, Helvetia, Haulapai Mountains, near Yucca, and Schultz, Colorado, Summit County. (b) Smaller deposits scattered through Western States.

OSMIUM.

[One of the minor constituents of crude platinum and osmiridium, and obtained only by refiners of crude platinum.]

Principal uses: None.

Need for Government control: No present need. Control of a commodity for which there is no market is innocuous, and it was thought desirable to include osmium in the bill, in view of the possibility that new and important uses for it would be discovered.

Domestic production: No definite information on production available, but probably constitutes about 0.1 per cent of the recovery of platinum. No market quotations on osmium, and at present there is no market for it.

PALLADIUM.

Obtained principally from refining copper and nickel, matte, and bullion; a small amount recovered from refining crude platinum.

Principal uses: Alloyed with gold for dental use, thereby releasing platinum for war uses; also as gold alloy to replace the platinum used by jewelers.

Degree of independence: The United States produces less than 50 per cent of its requirements, and this will be lowered to about 10 per cent when the nickel refineries now under construction in Canada are completed.

Need for Government control: Chiefly to see that palladium-gold alloys are used by jewelers and the dental industry instead of platinum and iridium.

Principal domestic sources: Copper matte and ores from the Rambler mine, Wyoming, and Boss mine in Nevada.

Domestic production and prices: (See under Platinum.)

Imports, 1917: Not accurately known, but small as compared with domestic production. Countries of origin not recorded.

PAPER CLAY.

Principal uses: Manufacture of tile and pottery; for filler and sizing in paper manufacture.

Need for Government control: To develop domestic deposits, to improve methods of mining and refining, and allocate imports to industries for which it is most essential.

Principal domestic sources: Major—Georgia, Pennsylvania, South Carolina. Minor—California, Washington.

PLATINUM.

(Also palladium, iridium, and osmium.)

(So-called platinum of jewelers is an alloy containing 10 to 25 per cent iridium and 75 to 90 per cent platinum. Electrical platinum is an alloy containing 15 to 50 per cent iridium and 50 and 85 per cent platinum.)

Principal uses: Nonmilitary—Large quantities of platinum-iridium alloy required in electrical industry, particularly by telephone, telegraph, and electrical control systems manufacturers. Pure platinum needed by sulphuric-acid industry and in chemical laboratories. Military—Pure platinum refined from the crude is required by the Government in very large quantities for the expansion of the "contact process" sulphuric-acid industry, and for the new nitrogen fixation plants. It is needed in the chemical laboratories, as utensils, of all industries supplying war materials. Platinum-iridium alloys are needed for electrical equipment on aeroplanes, trucks, tractors, and many of the instruments used by the Signal Corps and Medical Corps.

Degree of independence: The United States produces less than 1 per cent of the amount it consumes.

Need for governmental control: The War Department has already found it necessary through the War Industries Board to control the refining, distribution, and use of platinum.

Principal domestic sources: California—Placers in Yuba, Butte, Stanislaus, Calaveras, Trinity, Siskiyou, and Humboldt Counties. Nevada—In Clark County there are copper mines, some of the ores of which carry platinum and palladium. Considerable platinum and palladium are also obtained by the electrolytic refiners of gold bullion, copper matte, and bullion, and nickel matte. Oregon—Placers in Josephine, Jackson, Coos, Curry, and Grant Counties; and Sumpter, Baker County. Wyoming—In Albany County.

Domestic production (troy ounces).

Year.	Crude platinum containing some iridium, osmium, and palladium.	Refined platinum metals: Includes domestic crude and foreign crude refined in United States and recoveries by copper, nickel, and gold refineries.

POTASSIUM.

Principal uses: Nonmilitary—Component of fertilizers in agriculture, manufacture of soap, certain kinds of glass, matches, etc. Military—Ingredient of certain explosives (black powder).

Degree of independence: Until 1915 the United States was almost wholly dependent upon Germany for its potash supply. The domestic production in 1917 was approximately 10 per cent of the normal prewar consumption.

Need for Government control: Government assistance is needed in prospecting for potash deposits, in improving methods of treatment, in fostering the development of new deposits, in developing substitutes, and in restricting consumption to essential uses. New methods and recovery of by-products material may make possible competition with German potash after the war. With Government encouragement a much greater development should take place along this line.

Principal domestic sources: Western Nebraska, alkali lakes; Searles Lake, San Bernardino County, Cal.; kelp beds of the Pacific coast, chiefly California; also Washington and Oregon; distilleries and other industrial wastes, California and elsewhere; Marysvale, Utah, alunite; by-product from cement kilns, several States.

PYRITES.

(Synonyms: Pyrite, pyrrhotite, fool's gold, marcasite, coal brasses, iron pyrites, white iron pyrites, sulphur balls.)

Principal uses: Nonmilitary—For the manufacture of sulphuric acid, the larger part of which in normal times is consumed in the fertilizer industry. Military—Manufacture of sulphuric acid for use in munitions plants.

Degree of independence: 1917, production, 33; consumption, 100.

Need for Government control: To encourage development of domestic deposits of pyrite and of the substitute mineral pyrrhotite, particularly those near points of consumption. To effect an adjustment between pyrite and sulphur used in various plants so as to insure maximum economy.

Principal domestic sources: The principal producing deposits are located in Virginia, California, Georgia, New York, Alabama, Missouri; in the coal regions of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Pennsylvania; and in the zinc-lead district of Wisconsin. Large unworked deposits occur in all the Rocky Mountain States, in Maine, and in North Carolina and South Carolina. Minor pyrite deposits occur in practically all the States of the Union.

RADIUM.

Principal ore minerals: Carnotite, uvanite, pitchblende.

Principal uses: Luminous compounds for watch and chronometer faces, compasses, barographs, etc. Medicinal, chiefly as cure or palliative for morbid tissue growths, such as cancer.

Degree of independence: 1917, production, 100+; consumption, 100.

Need for Government control: The Interior Department has in the past operated a plant for the production of radium, and it may find it necessary to do so in the future. The scarcity of radium-bearing ores, the great difficulties in treatment, and the importance of radium in therapeutics make Government control desirable.

Principal domestic sources: Major—Colorado (Dolores, San Miguel, Montrose, and Mesa Counties); Utah (San Juan, Grand, and Emery Counties). Minor—Colorado (Routt, Rio Blanco, and Gilpin Counties); North Carolina; South Carolina.

Domestic production, 1908–1917: Not over 25 grams radium salts.

Price: $90 to $100 to $120 per milligram.

Imports, 1917: Value, $50.

SEA SALT.

Principal uses: The principal uses of sea salt are table and dairy, fish curing, meat packing, and refrigerating. California salt is used by the Pacific coast and Alaska fisheries.

Need fer Government control: To determine whether classes of salt readily obtainable in the United States can be substituted for imported sea salt in the fish-packing industries of the Atlantic coast, without endangering these important food supplies.

Principal domestic sources: California alone produces sea salt by evaporation of ocean water. The figures given are solar-evaporated salt made from sea water on San Francisco Bay, at Long Beach, and San Diego, and may include a very small amount of salt from California inland lakes.

The salt made by solar evaporation of the water of Great Salt Lake is not included here because of its high content of magnesium and calcium, which, it is believed, reduces the tissue permeability of the salt.

The Onondaga Coarse Salt Association, of Syracuse, N. Y., makes 25,000 to 30,000 tons of coarse salt annually by solar evaporation of natural brine, some of which is sold to Atlantic coast fisheries.

SULPHUR.

(Synonym: Brimstone.)

Principal uses: Under ordinary conditions about 150,000 tons of sulphur are used in the manufacture of paper, about 40,000 tons for agricultural activities, in addition to the use of sulphur for sulphuric acid, and a small amount for the manufacture of sulphuric acid for fertilizers. With the shortage of pyrite, larger amounts of sulphur are being used for the manufacture of sulphuric acid, both for agricultural and munitions purposes, so that in 1917, 463,364 long tons were used for this purpose. There is no information at hand as to the amount used for strictly military purposes; also used extensively in other chemical industries, particularly the vulcanizing of rubber.

Degree of independence: 1917, production, 105; consumption, 100.

Need for Government control: The munitions program of the Government calls for a quantity of sulphuric acid far in excess of our normal requirements. In order to meet the deficit of raw materials we have turned to sulphur and we must continue to depend upon it to a great extent. It is anticipated that the demand for acid will continue to expand and a large part of the added increment must be made for sulphur. The situation is made more acute by the limits placed upon pyrite importations from Spain. To utilize our pyrites and sulphur resources to the best advantage the two industries must be controlled as a unit, and in fixing prices it must be recognized that the two substances are competitors. It would be useless to try to stimulate the output of pyrites if no control could be exercised over the production and distribution of sulphur. Control is also needed to safeguard present supplies, to forestall profiteering, and develop new mines.

Principal domestic sources: The two main deposits are at Sulphur Mine, La., and at Freeport, Tex. These produce 99 per cent of the sulphur mined in the United States. Other producing deposits occur in western Texas, Wyoming, Nevada, and Colorado. Nonproducing deposits of minor importance are also situated in California, New Mexico, and Idaho.

TIN.

Principal uses: Manufacture of tin plate, solder, and bearing metals; tin oxides for enameling.

Degree of independence: 1917, production, 0.13; consumption, 100.

Need for Government control: To insure just allocation of imports to industries where they are most vitally needed and to promote development of the relatively small domestic resources.

Principal domestic sources: The principal producing deposits are in the York district, 100 miles northwest of Nome, Alaska. Periodically productive deposits are in North Carolina and South Carolina.

TITANIUM.

Ore minerals—rutile, ilmenite.

Principal uses: Industrial—As ferrotitanium in cast steel it is said to make castings freer from blowholes than the untreated metal, and to add strength; as rutile, in making electrodes for arc lamps; as titanium salts in tanning and dyeing; as colorant in pottery glazes and glass. Military—Important, but secret.

Decree of dependence: 1917, production, 100+; consumption, 100.

Need for Government control: Because demand heretofore has been insufficient to make operations profitable, producers probably will be unable, without Government assistance, to meet quickly the largely increased needs.

Principal domestic sources: Major—Virginia, at Roseland in Nelson County. Minor—New York, Adirondack region; Wyoming, Hartsville; Florida, Jacksonville.

Prices: The average price of rutile concentrated to 93 to 95 per cent TiO_2 has ranged around $150 a ton. Ilmenite concentrates has sold for about $25 per ton.

Imports: None.

TUNGSTEN.

Principal ore minerals, wolframite and scheelite.

Principal uses: Nonmilitary—Making high-speed tool steels, for which it is as staple as yeast in bread; tungsten filaments for incandescent lamps; contacts for internal-combustion engines. Military—All three uses are important in war work, high-speed tool steels making it possible to turn out the shells and other war steel needed with a minimum of time and men.

Degree of independence: In 1917, production, 65; consumption, 100 (estimated as metallic tungsten).

Need for Government control: If imports are reduced for any reason it will be imperatively necessary to develop many small or low-grade tungsten deposits in this country, and to do so within a reasonable time will probably require Government help in the form of a guaranteed price, technical supervision, or actual working of deposits. Uncertainty as to future market is now holding back further prospecting and new production.

Domestic sources. Principal—Arizona, Dragoon County; California, Atolia, Bishop; Colorado, Boulder County; Nevada, Humboldt County. URANIUM.

Principal ore minerals pitchblende and carnotite.

Principal uses: Main use is as a source of radium. Used in a small way as a substitute for tungsten in high-speed tool steels. Its various salts are used in pottery coloring.

Degree of independence: Domestic supplies are adequate for all present needs.

Need for Government control: The Interior Department has in the past operated a plant for the production of radium from uranium ores, and in view of the therapeutic importance of radium, the scarcity and difficulty in treatment of the ores, further Government assistance may be necessary.

Principal domestic sources: Major—Colorado: Dolores, San Miguel, Montrose, and Mesa Counties. Utah: San Juan, Grand, and Emery Counties. Minor—Colorado: Routt, Rio Blanco, and Gilpin Counties.

1917	23	$2,000

Average price: It is impossible to give an average annual price because there has been no market for the uranium as such. The value given on this sheet are figures derived from the price of sodium uranate produced. The comparatively low price of the ore has encouraged experiments looking to its use as a steel alloying metal. Almost the only present value for uranium ores is for the radium contained, and the ore would not otherwise be mined except in a most limited way.

Imports and exports: Not recorded, but small.

VANADIUM.

Principal ore, mineral roscoelite.

Principal uses: Nonmilitary—Vanadium is almost universally used in tool steels. It is also used extensively in steels in which great resistance to repeated strains is required, such as locomotive tires, automobile parts, and spring steels. Military—Each of these uses brings it into play in war materials.

Need for Government control: Fifteen tons of ferrovanadium were carried to Germany by the submarine Deutschland. Two American companies practically control the vanadium market. The scarcity of vanadium, its importance in the making of tough steels, the narrowness of its control, and the necessity of seeing that none reaches our enemies makes Government control essential.

Principal domestic sources: San Miguel County, Colo.

Domestic production.

Year:	Tons of metal in ore and concentrates.
1908–1909–1910, probably less than 200 tons of metal in ore valued at $175,000.

1913	432
1914	452
1915	627
1916 (estimate)	550
1917 (estimate)	550

Prices: The principal part of the vanadium produced is mined and reduced to metal by one company, so that it is impracticable to put a value on the ore. In 1910 and 1911 from 39 cents to 67 cents per pound for the metallic vanadium contained was paid for roscoelite ore in San Miguel County, Colo. Since then no vanadium ore is known to have been sold in this area. Vanadium has not been paid for in most shipments of carnotite ores. Vanadium in the form of ferrovanadium sold for about $5 a pound for the contained vanadium up to 1912. In 1912 the price of vanadium fell to $1.95 to $2.50, depending on the quality, and remained at this figure until 1917, when prices raised to $3.50 or more per pound.

Imports, 1908–1917: These came wholly from Peru, where the American Vanadium Co. owns the richest known vanadium deposits. Shipments have been as follows:

Mr. MADDEN. Then it is not the intention to go under the five-minute rule to-night?

Mr. WINGO. If we do it will not run very long. There are about 30 or 40 minutes for general debate remaining.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Before the gentleman gets into his regular talk, I would like to interrupt him. Under the provisions of this bill, do I understand the gentleman is not allowed to participate or assist in mineral production except in so far as that assistance is rendered to going concerns?

Mr. WINGO. I will cover that.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. One other thought, and if the gentleman will touch upon it I would be glad to have him do so. I wish the gentleman would explain to what extent the United States Government will be allowed to expend any portion of this revolving fund in investigation of the United States lands.

Mr. WINGO. Well, of course, I do not know as to the last proposition.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman will permit, I do not think it will be allowed to do so at all.

Mr. WINGO. Now, the first question is covered in the general purposes of the bill. Now, I will be perfectly frank with the committee. To a man holding the theory of government that I do, naturally when this bill was first suggested to me it did not appeal to me. Most of the objections that have been urged to it here at the time the rule was being discussed and since you have started under the general debate all of us could agree with as a general theoretic proposition.

But the considerations that move me as a member of the committee to abandon my prejudices against legislation of this kind were practical considerations. I think if there ever was a time in the history of this body when we ought to use practical "horse sense"—to employ a common slang expression—it is in dealing with matters like this.

Now, what is the situation that confronts us? These rare and semirare minerals may be considered insignificant things separately, with the exception of a few such as manganese, yet when you take the great bulk of these minerals and the amount of tonnage that is now being required in order to bring them into the United States and consider them in the aggregate volume, it is found to be very great. Now, we all know what the shipping situation is. The greatest war necessity covered by this bill is one of conservation of the shipping. If we can stop all of the imports as far as possible and save that shipping for the handling of our food supplies and our actual military supplies between here and France, that is a worthy and very commendable thing to do.

But we have got to have certain of these minerals. I am not technically familiar with all of them, but I have gathered this general idea from listening not only to the hearings, but to men in conversation with whom I have talked about it, that the great bulk of these articles are absolutely necessary, first in steel production and necessary in the construction of war materials, and necessary, a great many of them, as elements that enter into what you might call secondary construction of things that do enter into the construction of steel and different articles such as shells, and some of which enter into the construction of the gases that we are using, and some of which enter into the production of the caps of the small shells and the larger shells. That is the character of the stuff covered by these minerals. That being true, it is, of course, absolutely necessary that we should have a complete and constant supply to meet our war needs.

Now, what did we find was the next consideration that confronted us? With the exception of a few of these, the deposits in this country are so situated and so undeveloped in many instances that private capital is not going to go in and put up the necessary money to develop them and produce the flowing constant supply that we shall need unless they have some assurance that they will get a return for their money. That is a common-sense proposition that as practical business men we know is true. Now, the situation that confronts us is this: Shall the Government go out and go into the mining business, or will we undertake to authorize the Government to fix prices and guarantee prices up to a certain point that will be an incentive to men to go and put money into it and develop these deposits and bring them in? "But," you say, "you have authorized the Government to go into the mining business by giving this power over partially developed mines."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. WINGO. May I have three minutes more?

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman had 10 minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Have I used 10 minutes, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used five minutes. Accordingly, he has five minutes yet remaining.

Mr. WINGO. It is true that there is a provision in the bill that will authorize the Government to go and take over any deposit or mine. Is that not a necessary provision, for the Government to have absolute control? One reason why we framed one provision of the bill is that I, like others, do not like to have the Government go and take over a mine unless it is to guarantee a constant flow of material needed for manufacturing of war materials, but I want it fixed so there will be no quibble or delay. We have authority of law to take it. We have specifically provided that the Bureau of Mines, which has every one of these deposits charted now, may take over, develop, or operate, if necessary, and I want the authority to be so broad that if it is necessary it can go on and do it.

But gentlemen say, "Do you need $50,000,000?" To be perfectly frank with you, I will admit that that is an unknown quantity. I have been thinking about it during the discussion this morning more than during all the time the bill was considered by the committee. I think it would take that amount, because when you cut down suddenly the imports the Government ought to be in an attitude where, if it should place a general embargo upon the importation of these metals, to be able, when it sees that it needs those things and needs them quickly, to go into the open markets, if it wants to, and buy that much and turn it over to the plant that is manufacturing some war material. That is a practical business consideration, and it prompted us in thinking of having a revolving fund that the Government could use.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact: As I read the bill, somewhat hastily, as I admit, I found there is only one provision in the bill in which the $50,000,000 revolving fund is authorized, and that is section 11, and that applies only to the purchase of those things that are enumerated in section 1. It applies only to the purchase of these articles, such as antimony and arsenic and ball clay. I do not see in the bill any authorization for the use of this revolving fund of $50,000,000 except for the purchase of those things, and certainly the gentleman would not contend that we would need $50,000,000 for that purpose.

Mr. WINGO. I do not see how you can figure out how much you will need. As a practical business proposition, I do not see how you could do it. It is a business proposition, and I regret that we can not come in and say how much we will need for each particular ore.

You have got a great bulk of them here. It is true that the primary object of this bill is to guarantee the price and to guarantee at the same time the steady flow of these minerals necessary to meet the consumption in our war manufactures. Gentlemen can see that it is better for the Government to guarantee the price for two years and thereby induce private capital to develop the supply of these minerals than it would be for the Government to undertake to open up these deposits and develop and mine them as Government propositions.

In some instances it would be necessary for the Government to build railroads unless we follow the plan provided in the bill. I know of one great deposit of manganese that private capital would be willing to develop if given a sufficient incentive by a guaranteed price; but in order to get it out it is necessary to build a railroad, and the uncertainty of the market is such that unless they know they can have a market for at least two years at a reasonable price they are not going to put their money even into 8 miles of cheap railroad.

Something has been said about antimony. At one time I visited an antimony deposit in one county in my district. The gentlemen who own it have been after me. They are good protective-tariff Republicans. They have been after me ever since I have been in Congress to get them a protective tariff, and naturally I looked into it to see what the prices were. Before the war the price of antimony was about 8 cents. In 1915 it jumped up to 30 cents. In 1917 it dropped to 21 cents, and since then it has gone down a little lower. I know that in spite of that price one company has abandoned its mine. They say it is too uncertain, with the price jumping up and down, that the war may stop to-morrow, and they do not know whether they will get enough out of this to justify the expense of opening up the shaft, building the buildings, and assembling their plant and their organization. So they have gone away and abandoned it. Well, gentlemen need not say this is unpatriotic. It is a fact that the Government has got to deal with. We need this antimony. We need the manganese, we need the pyrites, we need the platinum, we need all these different things; and if we go dawdling along here for 12 months, perhaps, hoping we can cut down the imports and save our shipping in that way, and that patriotic citizens will come along and go to developing these small deposits just out of pure patriotism, it is too great a risk to run. So I think the businesslike thing to do is to come in and meet the emergencies of this war as proposed by this bill. So we propose to authorize the properly constituted bureau of the Government that has the technical knowledge and that knows where these deposits are to go in and stabilize the price by giving such a guaranteed price for not exceeding two years as will justify the men who own them in opening them up and developing them and producing these necessary minerals in sufficient quantities to meet our war needs. If they do that, after the war is over suppose we have fostered an enterprise that has developed mineral resources which will be worth a great deal to the country. That is not an objectionable thing, is it? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. I am sorry I have not time to discuss this matter further. It simply appeals to my good sense as a practical proposition to do this in order to save our shipping and at the same time stimulate the domestic production to the extent necessary to get these minerals in sufficient quantities to meet our war needs. It is a war need, and the bill is a war measure, pure and simple.

Mr. GARLAND. I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], a member of the committee.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill with one slight amendment. I think the bill as it stands will accomplish the objects which it seeks to attain. In the short time that I have in which to discuss it I want to mention the amendment that I shall offer when the time comes. It will be noted that the bill provides, in section 1, that the governmental control shall continue during the war and thereafter only until in the judgment of the President the agencies and activities herein provided for can be reasonably terminated.

Mr. MADDEN. That is pretty indefinite, is it not?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Again, in section 23, the same provision recurs. It is my intention to offer an amendment to limit the time of governmental control to six months after the period of the war.

The purpose of this bill is to encourage the production and conserve the supply of the war minerals enumerated in the first section.

The objects to be accomplished by the bill are mainly the stimulation of the domestic production of these minerals and the administration of their distribution so as to best subserve the needs of the Government in the prosecution of the war.

It is proposed by this bill that America shall be self-sufficient, in so far as it is possible for her to be, with reference to these important minerals. The necessity for the legislation lies in the impossibility of obtaining, under any circumstances, many of the products which have heretofore been imported into this country, and the desirability of curtailing the imports of those that can be obtained, so as to save shipping. It will be impossible, of course, for America to produce her full requirements of all of these minerals. For example, it is not hoped to secure any considerable production of tin in this country, but it is believed that in an administration by the Department of the Interior the tin and other minerals which it is necessary to import can best be conserved and distributed. I think there will be no difference of opinion concerning the laudable purpose of the bill; the only question, of course, which occurs is whether the proposed law will accomplish the purpose sought to be accomplished.

This committee and the House of Representatives, since the war has begun, has scrutinized any legislation which undertakes to interfere by regulation and administration with the production and use of any article of manufacture and trade. But when it has been found necessary there has been no hesitation in enacting such legislation. I think it is only fair to the committee, which has unanimously joined in a favorable report of this bill, to say that all of its provisions have been discussed and carefully considered. In its consideration the committee had the heartiest cooperation and valuable assistance of the United States Bureau of Mines and of the United States Geological Survey.

The committee secured, through those two bureaus and from the Secretary of the Interior and other governmental bodies, invaluable data, carefully and painstakingly prepared, and the bill comes to the Committee of the Whole House with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; Dr. Van H. Manning, of the Bureau of Mines; Director George O. Smith, of the Geological Survey; the War Minerals Board; the War Industries Board; the organization of State geologists; and many other officers and organizations in a position to understand the situation.

I am free to confess that I do not know the composition and value of many of these minerals, except from the data submitted to the committee. It would not serve any good purpose to discuss one after another the many different minerals named in this bill. The general purpose of the legislation, however, is made apparent upon the discussion of a few of them.

Take antimony, for instance, which is absolutely necessary to harden the lead for shrapnel bullets, we produced but 10 per cent of the antimony we used in 1917. Of the metallic antimony we imported 87 per cent of that imported from China, and we imported in 1917, 28,195 tons altogether. With the assurance of a steady market for a period of time it is possible for this country to produce practically all of the antimony needed.

GRAPHITE.

America produces about 10 per cent of the crucible grades of graphite. This is an exceedingly important war material, because of its use in the manufacture of crucibles required in the production of brass, bronze, crucible steel, and various other alloys; it is also used as a protective polish for high explosives, and as an antifriction paint on ships' bottoms. By Government control the development of domestic supplies can be fostered and improved treatment of domestic ores may be so directed as to increase the yield of crucible grades. The principal supply of our import trade in graphite has been Ceylon and Madagascar.

MAGNESITE.

Magnesite is extremely important as refractory lining for steel and other furnaces, for ship decks, and railroad cars. We produce 90 per cent of the amount required, and could easily produce all that we require. The 10 per cent that we imported came principally from Greece.

MANGANESE.

Every ton of steel that is manufactured requires from 14 to 15 pounds of manganese, and the steel industry is so closely related to this war that this is practically a military use. We produced in this country but 32 per cent of our manganese. The domestic supply could be greatly increased, and a just and equitable distribution of imported supplies could be arranged.

The importance of this is noted at once when we consider that in 1917 there were imported into this country—

Long tons of manganese	113,734
Long tons of furruginous manganese ore	423,987
Long tons of manganiferous iron ore	512,461
Long tons of manganiferous zinc residuum	155,332

Our imports came from Brazil, British India, and Cuba.

PYRITES.

Pyrites are called pyrrhotite, fool's gold, marcasite, coal brasses, iron pyrites, white iron pyrites, and sulphur balls; and in the coal regions are perhaps most familiarly known as sulphur balls. It is extremely valuable for us in the manufacture of sulphuric acid for use in munition plants. We produce about one-third of our consumption. America can quite easily produce all of the pyrites needed. There are many producing deposits in Virginia, California, Georgia, New York, Alabama, and Missouri, and in the coal regions of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Pennsylvania. In southwestern Indiana, in the district which I have the honor to represent, thousands upon thousands of tons of sulphur balls, or pyrites, have been taken from the veins of coal and not used; tons of it have not even been brought to the surface, but lays in waste piles at the bottom of the mines; tons of it have been piled in waste piles on the outside.

This country now has reached the point where it is of vast importance that an abundant supply of sulphuric acid shall be had. Before these pyrites, however, are made available the market must be stabilized, so that the producers in America can be assured that they will be justified in making the expenditures for such domestic production. In order to do this it is required that some governmental body shall have authority to speak for the United States Government and give them this assurance.

The definite guaranty of such a price for pyrite and sulphur that it will pay the operator to produce it will afford the opportunity for the coal miner, without adding to the price of coal and without affecting the profit of the owner of the coal mine, to add to his day's pay, and thus help him to meet the increased cost of living and the increased cost of his tools, powder, and equipment. The bituminous coal fields of district No. 11 of Indiana contain valuable pyrites—what is commonly called sulphur—that has been wasted for years as gob. The coal miner must dig this and handle it; yet he is docked if he loads it in the car. And why should not the coal miner have a way to make additional money. I have no patience with the statement you sometimes hear that the coal miner is overpaid. He goes down into the dark and dangerous caves, risks his life and limb, and toils almost to the point of exhaustion; yet he is paid less per month than many laborers in other vocations. He must be ready to work every day; yet many weeks he gets but one, two, or three days per week, while his expense goes on. He finds it difficult, on the wages he makes, to feed and clothe his family and keep his children in school. The great importance of the work of the coal miner has come to the forefront since the beginning of the present war, and he has responded nobly and patriotically to the needs of the country in its day of peril. He would have abundantly supplied the country with coal if the cars moved and motive power had been furnished to supply the coal mines. Just the other day the local organization of United Mine Workers of America in my district set aside part of the funds of the organization in order to purchase bonds in the third liberty loan.

(a) The miners have stood ready to do their full share in this mighty conflict, and they can be found to-day in great numbers in the military training camps, on the American battleships, and on the battle fields of Europe. One of their great leaders, John P. White, former president of the national organization, left his work and accepted an important position with the Government, where he is rendering inestimable assistance in connection with the Fuel Administration. His service is entirely unselfish; he not only receives no pay from the Government but has personally paid all of his expenses.

Edgar Wallace, editor of the United Mine Workers' Journal, the official publication of this organization, soon after the declaration of war, with his pen espoused America's cause in almost every issue. He is now in the military service and gone to battle with the allies against the central powers. He was past 50 years of age and was not eligible under the present regulations to enter the United States service. In his patriotic zeal to take part in the fight he joined the Canadian colors. And many other officials and members of this organization are to-day working in Government and patriotic organizations that have formed as the war has progressed.

When America and her allies shall have crushed our foe in this mighty struggle, and history shall enumerate the many elements that brought victory for the world's liberty, these men who have kept our locomotives running, who have kept the furnaces of our munition factories and our ordnance plants burning, and who have warmed and lighted the firesides of America shall not be forgotten.

It is not possible for the Government at present to disclose with definiteness the requirements of each of the minerals named in this bill. Practically all of them are of vast importance in the production of munitions and in the manufacture of gases. When we declared that a state of war existed between the United States and the Imperial Governments of Germany and Austria this Congress pledged all the resources of the country to bring the conflict to a successful termination.

Our task was not done when we pledged to the prosecution of this war the resources of this country. It is our task to so utilize these resources that the heaviest blow may be struck against our foe. It takes no military expert to know that upon America's shoulders shall rest a great part of the burden of furnishing the arms, the munitions, the gases, and the fighting machinery which will be necessary in the successful prosecution of the war. Military men tell us that the progress Germany made in trying to carry out the objects of her great offensive were made because she was amply supplied with gases, with big guns, and colossal accumulations of shot and shell.

The Secretary of the Interior has recommended the passage of the bill. These men have made a survey and have gathered statistics and facts and know the economic facts entering into the situation. They say that we must have this relief or else we can not go on in the future manufacturing munitions and manufacturing gases necessary to carry on the war.

Mr. MADDEN. Who says that?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It is said by the Secretary of the Interior and also by Dr. Manning.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the Secretary know about it?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. He is the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. MADDEN. Secretary Lane says at the beginning of the communication which is in the report of the committee that he does not know anything about it. He says:

> Of course, you realize I am not an expert mineralogist or metallurgist, nor do I know much about mines or the mineral resources of this country, excepting as I have come in contact with them in my life in the West and in my present duties.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is true, but he is at present the Secretary of the Interior, under which are the Bureau of Mines and the United States Geological Survey, so that he would naturally have some information about it.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman has just stated what I was going to say. The Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey being in his department, he would in all probability consult them, and his opinion would be based upon expert knowledge.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it reasonable to presume that the head of a department knows the technical details of matters for which men are employed in the various branches in his department? I do not think it is fair to assume that he does.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will read the entire statement of the Secretary before the committee, he will find that he enumerates many facts and substantiates them. To what source should we go if not to the head of the department of the Government which has these very things in charge?

(b) If this law effects the accomplishments of the objects sought, during the war, and America becomes self-sufficient, it will give such an impetus that with proper legislation, after the war, the country will continue its domestic production. New beds of ores will be found, new processes to recover many of these minerals as by-products will be discovered and developed, and America's industries shall become more and more independent. It is the hope of the civilized world, although I confess without any historical precedent, that great wars shall be at an end at the close of this mighty struggle. But no one wants America to rely wholly upon this hope, and no one knows what other nation, in the next quarter of a century, shall be at war with our own Nation. We should not be wholly dependent for many of the elements of our war munitions upon imports from other countries; we should be dependent upon imports only when they can not be produced in America. With the lessons we shall have learned during the present war, it is to be hoped that the United States will be able to defend herself by the use of force whenever that shall be necessary. We are already producing in America our merchant ships and battleships, we are progressing in the production of a great air fleet. We must now complete the task of preparing for the country's defense. Let us, by the proper encouragement and stimulation of our munition industries, and of the production of all the necessaries for use in munition industries, be prepared to turn out our own guns, to make our own bullets and shells and projectiles, to manufacture the powder and explosives required, and to produce in large quantities if necessary the gases for trench warfare. America has long boasted of her wealth, her resources, and her latent power. Her task is to organize and make effective this immense power and these inexhaustible resources so that her people may always be protected against any power which invades their sacred rights. In this mighty task America will not fail. [Applause.]

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Gentlemen of the committee, I am going to support this bill, but I am going to ask that it be amended in three particulars.

First, I think it should be limited to an expenditure of $10,000,000. I have reached a point in this war where I do not believe it is unpatriotic to be economical. This $50,000,000, of course, is set aside, to be later appropriated by an appropriation specifically made by the Appropriations Committee; but let us start off with $10,000,000 instead of $50,000,000 and see how the development of these small mines works out.

Second, I think this bill should be amended by permitting the Secretary of the Interior to enter upon the development of the mineral resources of the United States upon the public lands of the United States, and let us see if we do not have some public lands that are immensely rich in these secondary necessary minerals.

Third, I think this bill should be amended by permitting the Secretary of the Interior to call upon the various States of the Union to furnish the geological surveys and data that have heretofore been collected in reference to the mineral resources of the various States, without requiring expense to the General Government in going in to search for them in the States. I know that in Pennsylvania we have a very complete and exhaustive survey of the mineral resources of that Commonwealth, and these would be available if this bill permitted the Secretary to call for them, without cost and without delay, and time is exceedingly important now.

I am delighted to see my generous, genial old friend from Illinois, who is in charge of this bill, and the other members of this committee that constitute the Democratic majority, at last coming around to the good, sound Republican idea of "a protective tariff," because the placing, as this bill does, of a fixed minimum price upon these necessaries, as they are termed in the bill, at which the Government of the United States will buy them, is exactly bringing us back where we would have been if we had adopted a protective tarff five or six years ago and developed the resources of our own country instead of allowing these minerals to be brought in from abroad, and compelling us to pay foreigners for these minerals which we have in abundance at home.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And, if the gentleman will permit, would not have cost us $50,000,000, either.

Mr. ROBBINS. Would not have cost us anything; we would have paid our own people and developed our own resources.

Take tungsten, for instance—and I happen to know of a mine in Arizona that is located 15 miles from the railroad, high up in the mountains, that every chemist that has visited it pronounces it to be one of the richest deposits of tungsten yet discovered on the face of the globe. It is richer than the mines of South America, from which we import tungsten, and it never has been developed because it will involve an initial outlay of several millions of dollars, and no company would embark in that enterprise with the shipping facilities as they were prior to this war, such that would bring tungsten in from South America at a price that would not justify the initial investment required to develop the Arizona minerals.

Mr. MADDEN. How does the gentleman know it is so rich if it has never been developed?

Mr. ROBBINS. I know it because I helped to pay three chemists and experts out of my own pocket to go there and investigate it. I also know of a mine containing one of the minerals given in this list, to wit, magnesite, and the importation of which does not altogether depend on the fact that we do not have ships. It depends on the fact that the countries from which we got this mineral are to-day at war with us. Last year we imported 170,000 tons of magnesite from Austria. This is, of course, now entirely stopped.

Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to encourage the development of 45 secondary minerals, all of which are absolutely essential to the prosecution of high-grade steel for this war. For instance, chrome, vanadium, manganese, and tungsten are all necessary ingredients of steel that is used in armor plate, armor-piercing projectiles, steel used in the construction of automobiles, steel necessary in the manufacture of ball bearings of wheels, in the engines of automobiles, airplanes, cannon, ships, and so forth. Last year we imported these minerals as follows:

Mineral.	Quantity.	Value.
Manganese.....long tons..	750,000	$37,500,000
Pyrites.....do....	1,000,000	12,000,000
Graphite.....pounds..	48,000,000	12,000,000
Tin.....short tons..	80,000	96,000,000
Antimony.....long tons..	21,600	9,500,000
Chromite.....do....	72,000	3,600,000
Tungsten.....do....	4,500	6,000,000
Total value imports.....	.....	177,850,000
Additional value of domestic production.....	.....	120,000,000
Total.....	.....	297,850,000

In the case of chrome, which was formerly imported from Turkey and Caledonia, we are now compelled to search for these minerals at home, as importations are impossible. We are at war with Turkey, and we have no ships to carry the mineral from Caledonia.

The ordinary price of this mineral is from ten to fifteen dollars per ton. The market price now is $70 per ton and advancing The war has greatly increased the demand for it.

It is found in California in pockets, in Nevada and Idaho and southern Pennsylvania and some other parts of the United States. The mining of it is expensive, because it is at such great distance from railroads, and is not persistent in its stratification.

There is a mine in southern Pennsylvania that was worked extensively between 1827 and 1848, when the mine was closed because of the importation of cheaper ore from Turkey.

These minerals can all be found in the United States if the Government would protect the American miner and mine owner, so they can operate these mines and be assured that their investment will not be ruined and rendered worthless, and the money put into such enterprise be lost immediately at the close of the war because of the cheap ores from abroad.

The Report of the Geological Survey, found in public documents issued on the 26th of October, 1917, shows conclusively the abundance of this mineral and the ability of the American operators to produce it if properly protected.

The deposits of tungsten in Arizona, if the industry is properly protected, will furnish all of that mineral that is required in the manufacture of iron in the United States. The same is true of every article in this schedule.

Therefore I favor the passage of this bill, believing that we will not only become self-sustaining by producing these minerals in abundance from our own mines, but we will save the vast sum that we are sending abroad each year for this mineral and pay it over to American mine owners, American workmen, and American investors, and be free and independent of all foreign producers.

As stated above, if these minerals which have become so necessary in the manufacture of war materials shall receive adequate protection we would now have an abundant supply and not be paying $70 per ton for chrome and five or six prices for vanadium, manganese, and tungsten, and also be confronted, as we are now, by a diminishing and uncertain supply.

The United States has a greater area of these minerals than any other country. It is true that the deposit is not always as rich as it is abroad; our chrome will run about 55 or 60 per cent, while the Turkey and Caledonia will run as high as 80 per cent. The California, Nevada, and Idaho deposits average from 40 to 50 per cent, but within the last year explorations in these various regions have developed the fact that we have abundance of these minerals, and they will be developed, provided investors are insured protection for their investments; and I am glad that the majority party has now come around to admit the fact that by the protection afforded by this bill, which is in the shape of a guaranteed price by the United States Government instead of a protective tariff, they can secure an adequate supply from our home mines. And I make the assertion, which has been verified in other like cases, that when mine owners understand that they are to be protected, local competition will bring the price down to practically less than we could import these minerals from abroad. Competition at home has always reduced the price.

Sometimes it requires hard knocks to make our Democratic friends, who have control of this Congress, admit the true value of a "protective tariff" and its beneficial results, but in this case they seem to have come to the realization of that principle of political economy and to admit its truth and to adopt it, as they are now doing in this bill.

I earnestly hope that when the bill comes to be considered for amendment that it will be so amended that the Secretary of the Interior may be permitted to enter upon the public lands of the United States and develop these minerals. I have no doubt, from a careful study of the geological report as compiled by Prof. J. S. Diller, of the United States Geological Survey, and issued during the current year, that these minerals exist in great abundance on the public domain. We will, therefore, not only add to the wealth of the United States by proving the presence of these minerals, but we will greatly stimulate their development and production.

But, Mr. Chairman, I can not see any reason why we should appropriate at this time the very large sums of money stipulated in this bill. In section 17 it is provided that $500,000 is authorized to be appropriated for the purpose of "paying for personal services, traveling expenses, equipment, printing, publication, etc." This, of course, means that this sum is to be used in "exploiting, inspecting mines," etc. No part of this is to be used in actual development.

Under this section of the bill the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to create a large force to travel around the country inspecting mines, but in no instance are there to be any new developments from the expenditure of this sum. These places are to be outside the civil service, and it looks to me as if this is merely to create a large junketing party of specialists, or alleged specialists, who would do nothing but travel about and make reports. I am rather suspicious, especially when it is stated they shall be "outside the civil service." Who is to be the judge of the qualifications of these numerous high-class, high-paid specialists? What is to prevent favoritism and partisanship from entering into their selection? Who is to appoint them? What limit is there on the number or what standard is to be used in judging their excellence or in determining their selection? I do not like this. Let us adhere to the principle, at least, of having competent people in this service.

I shall move at the proper time to strike out, in lines 6, 7, and 8, section 2, page 3, which read as follows, "Any person may be employed under the provisions of this act without reference to the civil-service list and regulations."

I am not in favor of undermining the Civil Service Commission in its power to examine and certify proper persons for service under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I shall also move, when we come to consider section 18, page 18, to strike out "$50,000,000" and substitute in lieu thereof "$10,000,000."

This will be a sufficient sum of money for the purpose of establishing a fund to either buy these minerals at a fixed price or take over and operate mines where it may be necessary and to carry out the provisions of this bill in the beginning. In order to secure the minerals enumerated in section 1 of this bill, as I have stated above, let us not go into this matter too extravagantly. I believe we should have some regard for the expenditure of taxpayers' money. It is certainly not unpatriotic to keep a careful hand upon the Public Treasury of the United States. If, when these deposits are discovered and it is ascertained that more money is needed, Congress will be here and can promptly appropriate such additional money. The Treasury will certainly be in no worse condition than it is to-day to bear this increased financial burden.

Fifty million dollars is a vast sum, and it is a great temptation to this army of inspectors and the large number of mine owners, promoters, and investors to try to get their hand into the Treasury and get out a part of this money. Let us know what we are getting into before we pay out and appropriate and set aside such a large sum of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this bill; I believe it will result in the development of these minerals in most, if not in every instance, to the extent they are needed for the prosecution of the war, because during the war all of these are essential necessities, as they are termed in the bill, and also give us an abundance so we can export to our allies sufficient for their needs.

I want to sustain the administration in every effort it may make to fight this war. I want to support the President as the Commander in Chief of the Army in every way and $10,000,000 will be sufficient to start this program.

If I thought that anyone in the trenches would lose his life because we do not have steel and iron properly compounded and finished, then I would appropriate not only $50,000,000 but many times that sum. What we want to do above everything else is to overcome the whole of the German army, headed by the German Kaiser, and everything that will accomplish that end quickly and finally shall have my hearty and earnest support.

Therefore, I stand ready to indorse this bill, to vote for it, and to support its every provision earnestly and enthusiastically.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to assure an adequate supply, equitable distribution, and to facilitate the production and movement of necessaries, which necessaries are defined in this act to include only the following-named mineral substances and ores, minerals, intermediate metallurgical products, metals, alloys, and chemical compounds thereof, to wit: Antimony, arsenic, ball clay, bismuth, bromine, cerium, chalk, chromium, cobalt, corundum, emery, fluorspar, ferrosilicon, fuller's earth, graphite, grinding pebbles, iridium, kaolin, magnesite, manganese, mercury, mica, molybdenum, osmium, sea salt, platinum, palladium, paper clay, potassium, pyrites, radium, sulphur, thorium, tin, titanium, tungsten, uranium, vanadium, zirconium, and of other rare or unusual elements the supply of which may, in the judgment of the President, be inadequate for war and industrial needs; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, manipulation, and private controls, affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war and thereafter only until, in the judgment of the President, the agencies and activities herein provided for can be reasonably terminated. For such purposes the instrumentalities, means, methods, powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are created, established, conferred, and prescribed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, the word "kaolin," on line 4 of page 2, is spelled incorrectly—"koalin." I ask that the correction be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made by the Clerk as desired.

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, and I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that, with his permission, I will offer an amendment and have it pending, and shall be glad, if the gentleman thinks it wise or if his information is that it is wise not to pass it, later on to withdraw it. I move, on page 2, line 1, to strike out the words "and chemical compounds."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio moves an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONGWORTH: Page 2, line 1, strike out the words "and chemical compounds."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, before that motion is put, I would like to ask if we shall be permitted to offer amendments to this section 1 later?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will be better prepared later on to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter of jurisdiction of the committee, to be stated by the chairman. The Chair will state that the gentleman will have that right. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11259) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of those ores, metals, and minerals which have formerly been largely imported, or of which there is or may be an inadequate supply, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 24, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 24, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we desire to enter upon the duties of this day with a consciousness of the divine presence and blessing resting upon us. Draw near to us and give us the inspiration of Thy Holy Spirit that we may see clearly the majesty of the Lord and that we may realize that we hold a divine commission for the work that we are undertaking to do, and that we are resting constantly under the divine blessing. We ask these things for Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair presents the following certificate from the governor of the State of Louisiana, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF LOUISIANA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Baton Rouge, April 22, 1918.

To the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

This is to certify that, pursuant to the power vested in me by the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the State of Louisiana, I, Ruffin G. Pleasant, the governor of said State, do hereby appoint WALTER GUION a Senator from said State to represent said State in the Senate of the United States until the vacancy therein, caused by the death of ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, is filled by election as provided by law.

Witness: His excellency our governor, Ruffin G. Pleasant, and our seal hereto affixed at Baton Rouge this 22d day of April, A. D. 1918.

[SEAL.] RUFFIN G. PLEASANT, Governor.

By the governor:

JAMES J. BAILEY,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The certificate will be placed on file. If there is no objection, the newly appointed Senator will present himself at the desk and receive the oath of office.

Mr. GUION was escorted to the Vice President's desk by Mr. RANSDELL; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

DENIAL BY MR. CREEL.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, during the discussion yesterday the attention of the Senate was called to a newspaper clipping, in which it was stated that Mr. George Creel had approved a certain article appearing in the paper called the Masses. I think it is only fair to say that in yesterday afternoon's Washington Star Mr. Creel denied all and everything charged against him in the article mentioned, and in that denial he said:

Neither my committee nor myself has or ever has had authority to approve or disapprove an advertisement or any other article for publication in a newspaper or periodical unless such article is prepared in the office of the Committee on Public Information. That is a function of the Attorney General or the Department of Justice, if it belongs to anyone.

I have a slight recollection of the "I will not kill" advertisement, which was shown to me about a year ago, as I recall. Having no power or authority to forbid or to approve it, I did neither.

I distinctly recall, however, that I told the person who showed me the advertisement that it was infamous. I did not, as quoted in a New York paper, say it was foolish, or anything like that. What I said was that it was simply infamous. That is all I have to say.

I have no interest in this discussion whatever, but as a matter of justice to Mr. Creel I felt it my duty to insert the denial in the RECORD.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House insists upon its amendment to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 123) providing for the calling into military service of certain classes of persons registered and liable for military service under the terms of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, disagreed to by the Senate; agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 10613) to provide for the collection and disposal of garbage and miscellaneous refuse of the District of Columbia, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON. I have received a telegram and, while it is not my custom to ask that telegrams be read, as it relates to a very important matter I ask that it be read for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

ST. PAUL, MINN., April 24, 1918.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Our attention has been called to the fact that an antiefficiency rider penalizing premium and bonus payments and time studies is attached to the naval appropriation bill, which passed the House of Representatives on Saturday last. This action is in direct conflict with the desire of every patriotic citizen that there be a maximum of production and maximum efficiency in all matters connected with the successful prosecution of the war. It is likewise in direct conflict with the recommendations of the National War Labor Board, which were indorsed and approved by President Wilson and Secretary of Labor Wilson. We wish to protest in the name of patriotic citizens of Minnesota against the above amendment, the adoption of which at this time can have no other effect than render aid to the enemies of our Government.

MINNESOTA EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATION,
GEO. M. GILLETTE, President.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial from sundry members of the Chippewa Tribe of Indians in the Twin Lakes settlement, in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the expenditure of their funds for payment of claims made by certain persons, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Cleveland Post, No. 84, Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, praying for an increase in pension, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire to present for publication in the RECORD a patriotic expression from the general conclave of the Knights Templar, a loyal organization, now in session at San Francisco.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., April 20, 1918.

JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Resolved by the Grand Commandery Knights Templar of California in annual conclave assembled this day, That we are disquieted but not disheartened by the news that has been coming from the frontier of freedom in France. In unison with Christian men from every quarter of the globe our prayers go up to Him who holds our destiny in the hollow of His hand that He will look with favor on our cause and bless our undertaking with the success which it is our unalterable conviction should be our portion. We reaffirm in unqualified measure our belief in and loyalty to our beloved President and his declared aims in this great struggle. We hereby reavow our determination enthusiastically, ungrudgingly, and whole-heartedly to submit to any restraint and accept any sacrifice that may be imposed by the rigors and necessities of a war to the death; and, finally, we realize with unwavering certainty that peace now without victory means a world and a future without security. We want no peace but a permanent peace based upon considerations of justice and of equality, a peace in keeping with the principles and practices of Christianity; we want peace not at any price, but at whatever cost, and to that end, having due regard to the sacrifices involved no less than to the end to be gained, come what may, we pledge our continuing and undiminished support to the Government, the cause, and the flag until the war is won.

THOS. A. DAVIES,
Grand Recorder.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bristol County, Mass., praying for advanced rank for officers of the Medical Corps of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of the congregations of the First United Presbyterian Church of New Castle, the Fourth Presbyterian Church of New Castle, the Madison Avenue Christian Church of New Castle, and the United Brethren Church of Williamstown, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Columbia County Medical Society, of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to provide advanced rank for officers of the Medical Corps of the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the State Board of Education, Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, praying for a special Federal appropriation to the schools of that State, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of sundry letter carriers of postal station "D," of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Philadelphia Bourse, of Pennsylvania, favoring free zones in the ports of the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

BOND ISSUE BY SEWARD, ALASKA.

Mr. PITTMAN. On behalf of the Committee on Territories I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 9832) to authorize the incorporated town of Seward, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $25,000 for the purpose of constructing dikes, flumes, and other works to confine the waters of Lowell Creek for the protection of said town, and I submit a report (No. 408) thereon. I will state that unless the bill is acted upon immediately it will not accomplish the result intended to be accomplished by it and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Let it be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the incorporated town of Seward, Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $25,000 for the purpose of constructing dikes, flumes, and other protection to confine the waters of Lowell Creek, and to keep said waters from running over and upon the town of Seward.

Before said bonds shall be issued a special election shall be ordered by the common council of the town of Seward, at which election the question of whether such bonds shall be issued shall be submitted to the qualified electors of said town of Seward whose names appear on the last assessment roll of said town for municipal taxation. Thirty days' notice of any such election shall be given by publication thereof in a newspaper printed and published and of general circulation in said town before the day fixed for such election.

The registration for such election, the manner of conducting the same, and the canvass of the returns of said election shall be, as near as practicable, in accordance with the requirements of law in general or special elections in said municipality, and said bonds shall be issued only upon the condition that a majority of the votes cast at such election in said town shall be in favor of issuing said bonds.

The bonds above specified, when authorized to be issued as hereinbefore provided, shall bear interest at a rate not to exceed 8 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and shall not be sold for less than their par value with accrued interest and shall be in denominations not exceeding $1,000 each, the principal to be due in 20 years from the date thereof: Provided, however, That the common council of said town of Seward may reserve the right to pay off such bonds in their numerical order at the rate of $5,000 thereof per annum from and after the expiration of five years from their date. Principal and interest shall be payable in lawful money of the United States of America at the office of the town treasurer, or at such bank in the city of New York, in the State of New York, or such place as may be designated by the common council of the town of Seward; the place of payment to be mentioned in the bonds: And provided further, That each and every such bond shall have the written signature of the mayor and clerk of said town of Seward and also bear the seal of said town.

No part of the funds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be used for any purpose other than specified in this act. Said bonds shall be sold only in such amounts as the common council shall direct, and the proceeds thereof shall be disbursed under the limitations hereinbefore imposed and under the order and direction of said common council, from time to time, as the same may be required for the purposes aforesaid.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have the Senator from Nevada explain the reasons why the bill should be passed.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will do so with pleasure.

Without an act of Congress no town in Alaska has authority to issue bonds. This creek runs through the town of Seward, and runs parallel to the Alaska railroad that is being constructed by the United States Government. There are flood waters in the stream every spring. Last year this railroad was washed out and considerably damaged. The town is willing to put up the money for the building of the necessary dikes and embankments. The railway commission are anxious to have this done, and have recommended that Congress authorize the town of Seward to issue bonds to the amount of $25,000 for the purpose of protecting against the flood waters of this stream, which runs adjacent to the railroad. That is all it is. There is no appropriation on the part of the Government. The improvement will protect both the railroad and the town.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR BROUSSARD.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 230, submitted by Mr. RANSDELL on the 23d instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the Vice President in arranging for and attending the funeral of the Hon. ROBERT F. BROUSSARD, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana, upon vouchers to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

SEDITIOUS ACTS AND UTTERANCES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. OVERMAN. I present the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8753) to amend section 3, title 1, of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917. I ask for the adoption of the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the report be read.

Mr. OVERMAN. Before the report is read I want the Senate to hear what has been agreed upon, and I can state it in a few words.

There is no change in the bill as it passed the Senate, except as to verbiage and one amendment.

The first change was to strike out the word "discourage," the next to strike out the word "contemptuous," and the next to put in the word "willfully," to make it conform with the other sections making it criminal for whoever "shall by utterance, writing, printing, publication, or language spoken, urge, incite, or advocate any curtailment of production in this country," and so forth. We put in the word "willfully" to make it conform to the Thomas amendment.

Then we struck out the word "favor," so as to read:

And whoever shall willfully advocate, teach, defend, or suggest the doing of any of the acts or things in this section enumerated.

Then we confine the Post Office amendment to the time of the war.

That is all the change that was made, except we have stricken out what was known as the France amendment, which provided:

That nothing in this act shall be construed as limiting the liberty or impairing the right of any individual to publish or speak what is true, with good motives, and for justifiable ends.

Those are the only material changes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the report be read. I think we ought to have such reports read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.
